some relaxations respecting quarantine were necessary for the convenience of commerce, but great caution should be used, and it was a very proper rule that all descriptions of goods liable to infection should be unloaded and well aired for a certain period previous to their being delivered. A discretionary power was now vested in the privy council, in consequence of which the regulation respecting airing might be altered or omitted. A power of that kind had always a tendency to be much abused. His lordship then went on to state, that the best authorities gave their opinion in favour of the contagious nature of the plague; and that it had been imported at different times in cotton goods or other merchandise into Cephalonia and Corfu.

The Earl of Liverpool observed that the object of the present bill was two-fold—1st, to shift the expense of quarantine from the owners of the ships exposed to it, to the country whose health it was necessary to protect; and 2dly, to abolish penalties which were unnecessary, or to mitigate those which were too severe. He allowed that an unfounded alarm had been spread among foreign states, and that decrees had been made, grounded on a mistake of what had been done or what was intended to be done here; but those alarms would subside, and those decrees be altered, as soon as the real object of parliament came to be known.

The bill was then read a second time; and finally passed.

PUBLIC WORKS.

British Museum.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, FEB. 25.—Mr. Banks moved that a sum of 15,416*l.* should be granted for the service of the British Museum for the year 1825.

Mr. Croker rose to repeat an observation which he had made last year respecting the price at which the catalogue of books in the Museum was sold. A catalogue was, as it were, the key of the Museum, and highly useful, if not necessary, to the persons who wished to consult the books. The price of the catalogue now was 7 or 8 guineas, and this made it wholly impracticable for poor scholars to procure it. He was sure the house would agree to no vote more readily than to one which would enable the Museum to sell their catalogue at a cheaper rate. He did not at present urge the printing of a new one, because until the King's Library, and other additions which had recently been made, should be open to the public, it would not be advisable to have a new edition.

Mr. Banks said the price of the catalogue was only about four guineas, but that, he was aware, was too large a price. He would take this opportunity of reminding the house of the collection which had been ceded by Mr. Salt to the British Museum. A sum of 4000*l.* had been given to him for that collection, but he was still a loser by it, owing to the sum which he had had to pay for the alabaster sarcophagus. Mr. Salt made no demand for the sum he was a loser of, but he (Mr. Banks) hoped that some opportunity would offer of remunerating him.

The vote was then agreed to.

Sir C. Long presented a petition from the trustees of the British Museum, which he begged to read to the house. Mr. Rich, who had been in the service of the East India Company, as their resident at the court of the Pacha of Bagdad, had made, during the many years in which he resided in India, a very extensive and valuable collection of manuscripts, medals, and antiquities. It was the wish of that gentleman, who was since dead, that this collection should be in the possession of the British Museum, in order, that being opened to public inspection, it might be the means of facilitating the discoveries and studies of persons of science. His widow, in pursuance of this desire of her late husband, had offered the whole of his collection to the trustees of the Museum at a reasonable price, which might be fixed upon by persons who were acquainted with its value. The trustees, when this offer was made to them, felt bound to make an inquiry into the value of the collection. They procured the opinions of Dr. Macbride, Dr. Nicholls, of Oxford, Professor Lee, of Cambridge, and of Dr. Young, all of whom were well qualified to estimate the worth of such a collection. They gave their concurrent testimony that it was highly valuable, and would form an important acquisition to the British Museum. The collection consisted of 900 volumes of manuscripts, in the Persian, Turkish, Chaldaic, Syriac, and Arabic languages. They contained commentaries on the scriptural writings, and were likely to afford very important illustrations of the sacred text. Another part of the collection was composed of Oriental and Greek medals, the value of which would be satisfactorily proved to the house when he told them that they were held in the highest estimation by the late Mr. Payne Knight, who had carefully examined them. The last part of the collection was a large quantity of antiquities, which had been discovered in the neighbourhood of Babylon and Nineveh, on which were inscribed characters which had not yet been deciphered, and which it was obvious never could be deciphered but by means of comparing them with other similar remains. Notwithstanding the long and intimate connexion which we had with Asia, the library of the British Museum was almost wholly destitute of the productions of Oriental literature. This was one reason why he recommended the purchase of the collection; and another was, that it was in itself complete and entire, and contained not one duplicate of any thing the Museum at present possessed. He had, in the course of last session, when he called the attention of the house to the munificent gift which his Majesty had made of the late King's library, expressed a belief that his example would be followed by others. He had great pleasure in stating now, that Sir Richard Colt Hoare had expressed his intention of presenting to the trustees of the British Museum, for the use of the public, the large and valuable library which had been collected by himself and his family. It contained, among other valuable books, a complete collection of Italian history and topography, and amounted to not less than 17 or 18,000 volumes. After stating that the computed value of the collection of the late Mr. Rich was 8000*l.*, of which 6000*l.* was for MSS.; 1000*l.* for the medals; and 1000*l.* for the antiquities, the hon. bart. brought up the petition, which was ordered to be printed.

He then moved, that a committee be appointed, as had been done in the case of the Lansdown MSS., to report to the house their opinion on the proposed purchase; which was carried.

A sum of 7000*l.* was voted for the purchase of this collection in the committee of supply.

MONDAY, MARCH 22.—On the motion that 40,000*l.* be granted for the expenses of buildings at the British Museum,

Mr. R. Colborne said, that the Angerstein collection, which had been purchased by Government, and which contained many valuable specimens of art, ought, he conceived, to be placed in a more central situation than that in which the British Museum stood. He conceived that the British Museum was placed in a situation better adapted for the exhibition of works of science and of curiosity, than for the study of works of art. He wished to see Government lending every assistance to the progress of art in this country, and therefore he was desirous that the collection of Marshal Soult should be purchased.

Mr. Peel observed, that the testimony of Sir G. Beaumont, who wished his pictures to be placed in the British Museum, was to him conclusive upon this subject.

Mr. Hobhouse said, when he visited the British Museum, it was by mere chance that he discovered there were any pictures within its walls. He certainly wished that the national gallery of paintings should be separated from the British Museum. He did not like the idea of the great works of Raphael and Guido being placed in the same edifice with collections of animals and fossils. Such a mixture would be like uniting the Jardin des Plantes with the Musée. He certainly was hostile to having so many valuable works of nature and of art accumulated under the same roof, because they were, in case of fire, or any other accident, liable at one moment to the same catastrophe. He had no objection to allowing the supervision of the pictures to remain with the trustees of the British Museum. With respect to the collection of Marshal Soult (a collection, by the way, which he had obtained by plunder in Spain), it undoubtedly contained some very rich specimens of art; but, on the whole, it was a question, whether it was worthy of being purchased.

Mr. Croker spoke in favour of the erection of a national gallery in a central and commanding situation. To prove the necessity of this, he adverted to the fine collection of pictures at Dulwich, which was not very often visited; for Dulwich, he believed, was as far off as Russell Square, though he did not profess to know exactly where Russell Square was (laughter). Sir F. Bourgeois had given his beautiful collection to Dulwich college, merely because there was no place in town fit for its reception, and those to whom the offer of the collection was made did not choose to raise a building worthy of it. For the benefit of the arts in this country, the greatest facilities ought to be given to those who made them their study. A national gallery ought to be erected, not for the mere amusement of the curious, but as a place where the studious might learn a great lesson. Unless such an institution were placed in a situation where it was easily accessible, they never would have a great school of painting. Virtuosi, cognoscenti, and picture dealers might abound, but they were not likely to have a school in which painters of the first-rate eminence were to be found.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he knew not in what hands the national pictures could be placed with greater propriety than in those of the trustees of the British Museum. He believed every body at all conversant with the subject admitted that they were the very best persons to whom the custody of so great a charge could be given. As to the Royal Academy, he must say, that no man who had once seen the exhibition at Somerset-house could doubt that of all places in which works of art could be displayed this was the very worst. The archway was not large enough to admit more than one carriage. The only room in which sculptures could be exhibited must, of necessity, be on the ground-floor, owing to the weight of these productions. In Somerset-house the room appropriated for this purpose was so paltry a hole, that all the beauty of the works was lost, and he could not but wonder that any man of eminence would suffer his productions to be thrust into such an unworthy place. The other rooms were equally bad. The largest room was at the top of the building, and so long was the ascent to it, that no gouty gentleman or corpulent lady (and such persons had as good right to see the exhibition as those who were more active and less afflicted) could ever hope to attain the difficult height. He should be very glad to see some more convenient place provided for the Royal Academy, and in that case the Royal Society, who were much in want of such accommodation, could have the entire possession of Somerset-house.

Mr. Croker begged to call attention to the disgraceful way in which the Royal Society was at present lodged in Somerset-house. They possessed a fine library, but for want of room they could not use it. Many parts of it were put away in cases and boxes, which not only rendered the access to them difficult, if not impossible, but seriously injured the books. He hoped that the hint which had been thrown out that evening, would be shortly carried into effect, and that they would be put into possession of the apartments at Somerset-house now occupied by the Royal Academy. He had been for many years a member of the Royal Society, and he could assure the house that they were really prevented from discharging their duty to the public in a proper manner, owing to the want of proper accommodation, which they laboured under.

The vote was then agreed to.

St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey.

FRIDAY, APRIL 22.—Mr. Hume objected to an item in the civil contingencies, a grant of 1,031*l.* to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, for the alleged purpose of cleaning and taking care of the monuments in that cathedral. The pretensions put forth by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's were of the most extraordinary description. The public, for great national objects, had thought it advisable to expend some hundred thousand pounds in the erection of monuments to the memory of those who had achieved great actions, and had devoted themselves to the interests of the country, and the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's arrogated to themselves the right of doing with the national monuments whatever their prejudices, their caprices, or their sordid interests might dictate. They would not admit that these national monuments, paid for out of the national funds, were in any respect public property; and assuming a right of ownership, they would not even allow the public to see them, without paying a fee of admission. The contempt and indignation of the whole country at this paltry and arrogant conduct, had been expressed in every shape, by the press and otherwise; and as the public feeling and good principle of the case had not, in the slightest manner, affected the conduct of the Dean and Chapter, he would take the sense of the committee upon this grant.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that it was incumbent upon the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's to maintain that cathedral in repair, and that was no small expense. The charge of cleaning and keeping in good condition the numerous monuments in that public edifice was very large. He agreed that public monuments, placed in the great national cathedral by addresses to the throne, to commemorate splendid actions of great characters, ought to be open to the public at large, or the very object of erecting them would be defeated. At the same time it was not proper, because such monuments were placed in St. Paul's, that the Dean and Chapter should be burdened with the expense of keeping them in repair. However, he was not bound to be responsible for the manner in which the Dean and Chapter exercised their duty, and certainly he was very little inclined to take upon himself any such responsibility with relation to the present subject. The Dean and Chapter of Westminster were bound to maintain Westminster Abbey in a proper state; but he was very far from asserting that they gave the necessary facilities to the public in viewing either the edifice or its monuments (hear, hear). He was aware that reiterated and well-founded complaints had been made in every direction upon this subject, and he was compelled to say, that when he had visited the cathedrals with a view of looking at the national monuments, the exhibition had been conducted very carelessly, and in a manner that reflected no honour upon those who had the control of the arrangements. The whole system, at both cathedrals, was conducted in a manner that he by no means approved of; but he did not see that he had any power to require the Deans and Chapters of St. Paul's and Westminster, either to reduce their fees, or to alter their management.

Mr. Hume was happy to hear the rt. hon. gent. so unequivocally condemn a system which in itself was both mean and rapacious, injuring the country in the eyes of foreigners, and sinking the character of the clergy of the cathedrals in the estimation of the people. The fact was, that the expenses of keeping the monuments in a good condition was palpably a pretence, and the tax levied upon the public under this pretence, was completely at the discretion of the Deans and Chapters (hear, hear).

Sir John Sebright stated, that whenever he had conducted foreigners through these splendid buildings, in order to shew them the monuments so honourable to the country, he was thoroughly ashamed at the principle of pecuniary exaction established by the Deans and Chapters, and he was equally mortified at the whole system upon which these national exhibitions were conducted.

Official Residences.

MONDAY, MARCH 28.—Mr. Herries, in the committee of supply, moved that 40,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty to defray the expenses of workmen employed in the various public buildings for 1825.

Sir M. W. Ridley suggested that it would be highly proper, as well as convenient for the public service, to provide official dwellings for the principal officers of Government, attached to their respective offices.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that it had not been usual to make the personal accommodation of the members of the Government in respect to houses, any charge upon the public; but if it were just in principle to do so, that custom could be no good argument why the system should not be changed. Indeed, it might be, that a due regard for the dignity and character of the administration of the country in some cases required the adoption of such a change. Parliament would be bound, however, in assigning residences at the public expense to particular persons and offices, not to push the principle upon which they were to be so assigned too far. With regard to some individuals, such an assignment must be in some degree considered as conferring upon them additional incomes; but he thought that the general feeling of that house on these subjects, whatever it might be, would not be divided upon more considerations of an ill-judged or excessive economy.

Mr. Lockhart objected to any propositions of the kind which had been adverted to by the hon. bart. and the rt. hon. gent. If these new and splendid houses were to be built for the great officers of Government, there must follow, he presumed, as matter of course, additional incomes, and sumptuous furniture. The general effect of such a system would only be to render the officers themselves less accessible than they at present were, and to increase the public burdens.

Mr. E. J. Littleton thought that many individuals, who were high in the public service, ought to be lodged at the public expense. Among others he might particularly instance a rt. hon. friend of his (Mr. Canning), whom he regretted not to see in his place, and he was obliged to receive more visitors, and to entertain more company, than any other minister—namely, the foreign ministers, ambassadors, and functionaries; and a vast number of other persons. A great proportion of the more important offices in the Government were quite underpaid; and he thought it would be more beneficial to the public service that the persons filling them should be paid higher salaries than they at present received, than that they should be provided with houses at the public expense. No period could be better than the present for establishing some such system.

Mr. Baring stated that he was very much in favour of building houses for the principal officers of state, not exactly for the convenience of the individuals, but for the benefit of the public. He believed the expense to the public would not be greater than it was at present.

Mr. Hume objected to the way in which buildings, the property of the public, were at present disposed of. He knew of one instance in which a public officer, whose salary was not more than 120*l.* a-year, was lodged in a house of the value of 2,000*l.* or 2,500*l.* per annum. He protested against spending more in buildings, especially in providing houses for ministers. He never found them unwilling to retain their places because they had not houses provided at the public expense (a laugh); and though they had not yet enjoyed that convenience, the affairs of the public had gone on just as well as if they had been more magnificently lodged. He did not wish that any public building should be erected for any public officers, and if they did not like to continue in office because they had to come from their private residences to their places of business, why let them resign.

Mr. T. Wilson said there were many cases in which it was necessary to spend a shilling to save a pound. It was so in the present instance. No man could so well attend to his business who was not on the spot where it was carried on; and he therefore thought that money expended in such a way would be well laid out, even with a view to public economy.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Custom-house.

Mr. James Martin requested to be informed what was the nature of the defect that had displayed itself in the structure of the Custom-house, and by whom the expenses of repairing it were to be defrayed?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that in the first place the expense of these repairs must be paid for out of the public funds which came into that department of the revenue. What the amount would be, it was impossible at present to say. It was very true that a serious defect had manifested itself in the building in question, which had been erected at a great expense, under the management of an architect who was not, unfortunately, under the control which had been subsequently imposed on all architects employed on public edifices—namely, that of the Board of Works; a very injudicious exemption, of which this case sufficiently evinced the mischievous consequences. The individual he spoke of was then the ordinary surveyor of the customs only, and he employed a contractor, by whom, in effect, the custom-house was built. The specifications usual in such cases were regularly drawn between them, and when the building was finished the architect certified that the work done had been according to those specifications. Very lately, a particular part of the building—a most important one, called the long room—had given way; and it was but too true that a most scandalous fraud was found to have been practised in that part of the structure. For instance, that part of the edifice was built on piles; and according to the terms of the specification under which the builder had agreed to act, there were to be under one pier of an arch nine regularly distributed piles. This arch was precisely the one which had since given way. And it now appeared that there were only four piles and a half, instead of nine, and even these were not put in any regular line or distribution. The piles themselves, too, instead of being round solid pieces of timber, like masts of ships (which were most preferred in this kind of building), proved to be rough trunks of trees, with the branches merely lopped off. All this was undoubtedly very disgraceful to the individual who had executed the contract. Every means had been taken to recover to the public, as nearly as possible, the money which would be required for making good this defect. The party who undertook the contract to the architect was a person of some property, and the requisite measures had been resorted to, to secure to the public an adequate compensation from him. Whether there had ever subsisted any sort of agreement between the architect and the contractor or builder, that could bring them within the operation of the law, he was unable to say; but the question was now under consideration.

Mr. Ald. Wood, having the pleasure of knowing Mr. Peto, thought that charges of this kind, coming from so high a quarter in that house, ought not to be hazarded until they could be brought forward, if at all, in some tangible shape (hear, hear); the accusation ought to be distinctly stated.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the question came to this—whether, the work not having been performed in the way mentioned in the specification, the architect had not certified that it was really so performed? A question of so serious a nature rendered much investigation necessary.

This subject was again mentioned on April 15th, and Mr. Herries promised that no time should be lost in bringing the business to a decision.

Thames Quay.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.—Col. Trench moved for leave to bring in a bill to build a quay and terrace on the north bank of the Thames.

Mr. Calcraft was sorry to show any disposition to oppose a project which many persons considered an improvement; but he thought that it could not be carried into effect without material injury to the property of a large number of individuals. He interfered in this stage of the bill, because the standing orders of the house had not been complied with. His objections, in point of form, were first, that a sufficient schedule, descriptive of the alteration proposed, had not been deposited in the proper offices; in the next place, the list furnished of assents and dissents among persons interested, was not complete. He held a petition in his hand from the Duke of Norfolk, complaining of the insufficiency of this list. The petitioner was a very large possessor on the line proposed to be cut up and altered; and yet no application whatever had been made, either to him or his tenants, upon the subject. The injury which this quay, if ever erected, must produce to the water-side property, was obvious. Independent of the balustrade, the foot-path was to be 23 feet above the level of the carriage way in Arundel-street or Surrey-street; so that the inhabitants of those streets would lose the light as high as their first floor windows. But his chief reason for opposing the bill at present was, the total impossibility which he saw of its ever succeeding. The cost alone put it out of all question. One prospectus had stated the probable expense at 400,000*l*. Another afterwards raised it to 600,000*l*. A third said something about the Chancellor of the Exchequer giving 200,000*l*. towards the plan (hear, hear). But it was not five times 600,000*l*. nor much less than 5,000,000*l*. in his opinion, that would complete it.

Mr. Hobhouse opposed the measure upon a petition from two individuals who held nearly half the Thames bank between them, from Craven-Street to Temple-bar. The mud-dock contemplated would be a great nuisance, and quite certain to create miasmata. He opposed the bill in the present stage, to save the enormous expense of going into a committee above-stairs to no purpose.

Col. Trench said that the conductors of the scheme had acted advisedly, in not making the discovery. Four years ago he presented a petition to the house from a Mr. Lester, who at the same time showed him a book which he had published in 1782, pointing out the very same process of road-making that Mr. M'Adam now claimed as his own; and Mr. Patterson, a surveyor in Forfar, also claimed the merit of having discovered the same process, long before Mr. M'Adam's plan was heard of. Under these circumstances, he thought there was no claim on the ground of originality. He also objected to this claim without having the items of Mr. M'Adam's expenses set forth. From a return which was on the table, he found that Mr. M'Adam was employed on 79 trusts in 28 different counties; and upon that fact he contended that the counties benefited by Mr. M'Adam's system should remunerate him for it, and not the community at large. It was not right that the people residing in Norfolk, in Ireland, or Scotland, should pay for making a fine road from Carlton palace to the Regent's Park (hear). It was said in support of this grant, that Mr. M'Adam had received nothing from the trustees of squares and bridges, and of parishes, to which he had repeatedly given his advice. If that were so, whose fault was it? Certainly not that of the public; and it was therefore unfair to call upon the public to furnish out of its generosity those funds which ought to have been furnished by the justice of those to whom Mr. M'Adam had given his exertions.

Sir T. Baring spoke in support of the grant, and contended, that the house, in passing it, would not be establishing any new precedent, inasmuch as there had been upwards of 20 similar grants for similar public benefits in the last 20 years.

Mr. H. Sumner acknowledged the great merit of Mr. M'Adam's system, but could not look upon it as a new invention, as the roads in his neighbourhood had been made upon it for the last 50 years. He thought that the greatest national benefits might be compensated at a rate cheaper than the current expense which the services of Mr. M'Adam's family had cost to the country. In five years Mr. M'Adam and his four sons had received from different public trusts no less than 41,000*l.*

Mr. Maberley referred to the evidence before the committee to justify Mr. M'Adam. He had not thrust himself upon the public. Lord Chichester had testified to the Committee that the Post-office had sought Mr. M'Adam, and his Lordship admitted that in treating with him he had concurred in the propriety of Mr. M'Adam trusting to a public reward. If the hon. member had known of the plan of Mr. M'Adam so long ago, so much the worse for his case; he ought not to have allowed the roads of Surrey to remain as they were, the worst about the metropolis.

Mr. F. Palmer was a member of the committee above stairs, and stated the extreme difference of opinion as to the claims of Mr. M'Adam. He thought that there was too much indifference shown to the public money and too much weight given to the merit of Mr. M'Adam.

Mr. Hart Davis said that many of the roads repaired by Mr. M'Adam had fallen under his own observation, and he could assure the house, that several, which had been the worst roads in the West of England, had, by Mr. M'Adam's exertions, been converted into the best possible state.

Sir E. Knatchbull said that could he feel assured that the present sum was to be the liquidation of Mr. M'Adam's claims upon the public, he should support the grant; but Mr. M'Adam had already received 4,000*l.*; the house was now called upon to vote a further sum of 2,000*l.*, and he believed that they would, ere long, be applied to for further remuneration.

Sir R. Wilson was able to bear unequivocal testimony to the services which Mr. M'Adam had rendered to the public. He did not, however, estimate those services by any quantity of road that Mr. M'Adam had laid down, or even by any quantity that had been laid down by others upon his principles, but he appreciated his merits in introducing a system of improvement, and in originating a series of observations and experiments which had almost brought our roads to an equality with the old Roman roads. As to the objection that he was not the inventor of the present system of road-making, he had as clear a right to the merits of invention, as could, from the nature of the case, be established. Individuals had come from all parts of the empire to receive instructions from Mr. M'Adam, and to witness the effects of his system; these persons had diffused the benefits of the improvements in every direction, and there were very few interests in the country that did not derive sensible advantage from the ameliorated state of the roads, arising from Mr. M'Adam's ingenuity. He should, therefore, feel it his duty, upon every principle of public utility and private justice, to support the grant.

The Committee divided.—For the grant, 83 —Against it, 27—Majority in favour of the grant, 56.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Diplomatic Service.

MONDAY, MARCH 21.—On the motion (in a committee of supply) that 160,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty to defray the expense of civil contingencies,

Mr. Hume adverted to the large amount of our diplomatic expenditure, of which part came under this grant. That expenditure for the present year amounted to 300,000*l.* In spite of the suggestions of the Finance Committee, in 1816, that this expenditure should be reduced, we had expended, in the last seven years, 2,060,000*l.* in the expenses of our ambassadors alone. He complained of the manner in which the diplomatic accounts were intermingled with those of other departments. For instance, in one class of the civil list, 226,000*l.* was annually charged for the expenses of our ambassadors. He was aware that in one year 11,000*l.*, and in another 7,000*l.* or 8,000*l.* of this sum had been returned; but the average amount was 226,000*l.* Now, in addition to this sum, bills were annually sent in from each of our residents, which had reached, he must say, an unwarrantable amount. In 1792, they were but 5,900*l.*; in 1818, they had reached 37,000*l.*; but in the last year they amounted to the extraordinary sum of 80,000*l.* So that our diplomatic expenditure at present amounted to somewhere about 312,000*l.*; and this exclusively of the 60,000*l.* now wanted for the establishments of our different consuls in South America. He contended that the rt. hon. Sec. (Canning) would consult the interests of the public by withdrawing our ministers from the petty states of Germany, and applying their allowances to defray the expenses of our new diplomatic relations in South America. He complained of the great expence occasioned by our embassies to the various great courts of Europe, and especially to that of France, and concluded by expressing a hope that the rt. hon. Sec. would do every thing in his power to lessen them.

Mr. Canning said, that the House of Commons in 1816 had minutely examined the whole diplomatic branch of the public expenditure, and laid down a scale for its future arrangement. He had guided himself by the scale then laid down in all his arrangements, and had endeavoured, as much as possible, to make such retrenchments therein as were consistent with the public exigencies. With reference to the different public missions to South America, he thought that the scale of allowance was regulated rather lower than above the fair principle of remuneration. It was clear that if this country were disposed to encourage a close connexion with these new governments, they must be prepared to meet the necessary burdens of the new expenditure arising out of such a connexion. But he was surprised at the hon. gent.'s proposal to defray this expence by a retrenchment in the diplomatic missions among the smaller states of Europe. In many of these missions to the smaller powers, a larger question was involved than the mere expence of diplomacy. The good-will of such powers was well purchased by the comparatively trifling expence of the diplomatic establishments; and he could assure the hon. gent., that in the three instances in which he had reduced the expence of these missions, it had cost the British government great pains to convince the courts where such reductions took effect, that it was not intended to lower them in the estimation either of great Britain, or the larger states in Europe. With respect to what had fallen from the hon. gent. on the subject of the Paris mission, he was confident that the late ambassador would have been unable, without the aid of his private property, to have sustained the essential dignity of his diplomatic station out of the public allowances; and as to the present ambassador, with whose private affairs he was better acquainted, he could assure the hon. gent., that that noble lord (Granville) would feel himself perfectly satisfied, if in addition to his allowance of 11,000*l.*, he had not one-half as much more, perhaps entirely as much, to supply from his private fortune, in balancing his expenditure. He agreed in the propriety of selecting men of independent fortunes to fill such high offices; but he would add, that they ought not by undue reductions to make them unfit for others who might be called, without such private advantages, into the service of their country (hear, hear). He repeated, that he had endeavoured to regulate this department with reference to the scale agreed upon in 1816; but he must say, that he did not think the mere mention of particular sums in its expenditure, with a circumscribed reference to particular and evanescent circumstances, the proper way in which the country ought to estimate such matters, either with justice to the individuals, or with reference to the honour and utility of the public service.

Mr. Hume replied, that it was not for him to say, for he had not the necessary information, which of the German embassies ought to be reduced, or why they should be called upon to pay so many thousands a year for an embassy to the Two Sicilies, where a plain consul would answer just as well. But he begged to ask the rt. hon. gent. whether Holland, where the British embassy cost 14,000*l.* a-year, and where a minister with 6,000*l.* could do the business, did not wish this country to reduce the rank of the embassy, and complained that she could not maintain one upon the same diplomatic scale to represent her in England; and he would further ask, why such proposal had been declined by the British government?

British Claimants on Spain.

Mr. Hume (in the same committee) alluded to the item of 8,247*l.* for the expences of the Spanish commission for investigating the claims of British merchants. Where were those commissioners—who were they—and what had they done?

Mr. Canning said, that a few years ago many British ship-owners had incurred heavy losses by captures made upon them by Spanish subjects, contrary to the law of nations. They naturally solicited their own government to obtain redress, and various applications had, in consequence, been made to the then Spanish authorities. After this course had been duly taken, and no proper redress afforded, the government issued an order to the British Commander-in-Chief on the West-India station, to make reprisals upon the commerce of the Spanish islands to the amount of the British claimants; but it was thought reasonable that when this order was issued, and before it was carried into execution, that the government of Spain should be informed of the fact, before summary measures of redress were resorted to. This led to a further negotiation, in the first stage of which the Spanish government conceded an acknowledgment of the principle of the British claims, and abandoned that denial of justice which was their previous ground. The matter was then referred, upon the admission of the principle, to a convention which was to inquire into the specific extent of the losses, for the purpose of their eventual liquidation. During the preliminary proceedings, the Spanish government underwent a change, and the King of Spain upon his restoration annulled all the acts of the preceding government; but this convention was subsequently recognized, which, indeed, was the only act of his predecessors which his Spanish Majesty had acknowledged. The convention being thus resumed, the commissioners went to work but slowly, from the peculiar circumstances under which they had to act. Months were lost before the King of Spain had appointed new commissioners, and even during the last year the Spanish commissioners had been changed no less than three times. Notwithstanding these impediments, he was glad to state, that of the claims of British merchants, estimated at upwards of 400,000*l.* nearly 200,000*l.* had been admitted by the Spanish authorities—he wished he could add, paid (a laugh). That the whole of the claims would be acknowledged he had no doubt, and he did not absolutely despair of their ultimate adjustment. As to the expences of the commissioners, they would not be ultimately defrayed by the public, but by a per centage upon the amount of claims, which were the object of the investigation.

This subject was again alluded to on Tuesday, June 28, but no further information was elicited.

Military Occupation of Spain.

FRIDAY, JULY 1.—Mr. Brougham rose for the purpose of proposing a question to the rt. hon. Secretary (Canning) respecting the military occupation of Spain by France. He had hitherto abstained from asking a single question on this subject, fearful that an open discussion in that house would be productive of mischief; fearful, he might fairly add, the observations which would necessarily be made in the course of such a discussion would not only irritate the two houses, but would also have the effect of making worse the situations of those gallant and illustrious characters who were now imprisoned martyrs in the cause of liberty—men who had staked their all, and who had lost all in that glorious cause, but their honour (hear, hear), which had come out brightened and purified from the ordeal through which it had passed (hear, hear). But now, at the close of the Session, when nothing violent or harsh could be expected to be said, he thought he might without injury venture to propose one question. It had been long since stated, that when Ferdinand was fully restored to power, the French troops were to be withdrawn from Spain. That time had arrived, and still the French troops remained; my more, they had fortified Cadiz; in addition to which, they held St. Sebastian and several other places. Were they then to remain in Spain as long as the King of France, or as Ferdinand himself wished for their presence (hear, hear)? If such was the wish of these two powers, it became the duty of England to interfere and prevent it (hear, hear). It became our duty, because it was contrary to sound policy; it was contrary to the balance of power, that we should allow it. In a short time, new reasons might be urged, and Ferdinand might say, that the French troops should remain in his territories so long as Spain was at war with her South American Colonies (hear, hear); and then they would be able to understand that two Swiss regiments were kept at Madrid, and the French troops in the country, in order to allow Spain to send out her own troops to subdue the liberties of South America (hear, hear). The present policy of France was most dangerous—it had a tendency to destroy the balance of power in Europe; and what would be our situation, in the event of another war, with Ireland exposed to the iron coast of Spain, guarded, not by Spaniards, of whom, perhaps, we should think less, but by Frenchmen (hear, hear)? He would, therefore, beg leave to ask the rt. hon. gent. whether there was any reason to hope that the French troops would shortly evacuate the Spanish territory?

Mr. Canning said, that Ministers had received from the French Government, from time to time, such assurances as satisfied his mind completely that there existed no intention to occupy the fortresses of Spain, after the French army should have been withdrawn. It now appeared that the additional fortifications, about which so much had been said, reduced themselves to common repairs. He was able to assert, most distinctly, that not one sou of French money had been expended upon those fortifications, and not one sou, he was confident, of the money of Spain beyond what was necessary to keep them up. Perhaps it might be satisfactory to state further, that in the month of December, a distinct application had been made to the French Government for a disclosure of its views with regard to Spain. The answer was, that it was intended to reduce the Army of Occupation to 22,000 men, continuing an extra corps on foot in the country until the month of April. He had every reason to believe that that extra corps had either been, or was in a course of being withdrawn. With regard to the period when it might be expected that the remaining 22,000 men would be removed from the Spanish territory, he was not prepared to give any opinion, and he doubted if even the French Government could give a satisfactory answer to the question; he, nevertheless, believed that the learned gent. could not be more desirous that the French troops should evacuate Spain, than the French authorities were themselves anxious to commence that operation. They hoped to see all the objects of that occupation fulfilled, and that they might be accomplished, they still retained possession of the country. It certainly appeared that much that had been anticipated on this side of the water, as to the consequences of the presence of the armies of France, had not been realised. He begged to repeat, honestly, as an individual, he felt no degree of apprehension, alarm, or jealousy on the subject. He was satisfied in his conscience that there was a bona fide intention on the part of the French Government to evacuate Spain, as speedily as circumstances would permit.

Lord J. Russell could not refrain from noticing the melancholy spectacle presented by the incarceration of many friends of liberty in Italy, where men of high education, refined habits, and lofty rank, accustomed to all the delicacies of life, were confined in dungeons, or performed the drudgery of galley slaves (hear, hear). He did not wish to say any thing disrespectful of the Government of Austria, but he could not help observing that the minds of all men, in all countries, would be much conciliated towards that Government by a relaxation of its severity. At the present moment those harsh measures, which seemed excusable a few years ago, were not required, and he trusted that they would be abandoned. Such a course would tend to augment incalculably the influence of Austria in Italy.

South America.

THURSDAY, MAY 16.—Mr. Canning laid upon the table a copy of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the kingdom of Great Britain and the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata.

FRIDAY, JULY 1.—Mr. Baring observed, that a person of great distinction, the Envoy from Buenos Ayres to this country, had not yet been presented to his Majesty; he had heard that this circumstance was attributable to the representations of certain European Powers, and that they had also induced the British Government to consent to a limited recognition of some of the independent States of South America, instead of the recognition previously contemplated. He wished to learn what was the fact, and also to be informed, whether it was by accident only that the Envoy from Buenos Ayres had not been introduced at Court? It was but justice to state, that he made this inquiry without any communication whatever with the distinguished individual to whom it related. He wished also to ask another question, referring to a gallant and meritorious portion of the British subjects—he meant those officers who had been taken into the service of foreign countries. The act which placed these individuals in a most extraordinary situation, was still in force. In making this observation, he did not mean to call in question the policy of the bill to which he had referred; nor would he inquire whether it had been called for by circumstances at the time when it was passed. The law to which he referred imposed a degradation—imposed a severe punishment on persons who might contravene its provisions; and yet there was not a gent. who heard him, who must not view with the highest respect the conduct of those individuals, and who must not esteem them, on account of the noble motives by which they were actuated. The state of things which had given rise to it having passed away—England having recognised the independence of several of the South American states—the law should be altered. Subjects of this country had, in periods of peace, held high commands in the French service. We had supplied admirals to Russia, and officers of various descriptions to Austria, Spain, and Portugal. It was of great importance to the military power of this country, that English officers should, in time of peace, be enabled to keep up their military knowledge by entering into the service of foreign states. France, at the present moment, was pursuing this system; she was pushing her military officers into every possible service. They were employed in Greece, in Turkey, in every situation where their abilities were likely to be matured. He submitted these few observations for the consideration of Government. If nothing were done, he would in the next session submit a motion on this subject.

TUESDAY, JULY 5.—Mr. Canning rose to answer the questions put on a preceding evening by the member for Taunton. The hon. member (Mr. Baring) had remarked, that an individual of great respectability, accredited to this country by the state of Buenos Ayres, had not been presented at the last levee; and, from that fact, the hon. member inferred that some interference had been used by foreign powers. He (Mr. Canning) desired to say that no attempt had ever been made on the part of any foreign state to regulate, in the slightest degree, the conduct of this country towards any of the states of South America; nor, if such an attempt had been made, could there have been the least chance of its being successful. The fact was that the individual in question, although he appeared in the character of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, had no regular credentials. The state of Buenos Ayres had sent this gentleman a paper appointing him Minister Plenipotentiary to this country, and also to France; and he thought that England was not stickling too much upon ceremony in saying that she must desire to have an entire minister to herself. It had been suggested in some quarters, that these new states might well be placed, in some points, upon a more free footing than the older ones. In this view, he by no means agreed. He thought it sufficient that they were fully and regularly brought into the community of nations; and, as far as his advice went, the same full observance of all forms and arrangements should be required from them as from the oldest, best secured, or most despotic governments existing. The paper which this gentleman produced might be sufficient between his government and himself; but it was not sufficient as between his government and this country. There was another point, upon which he desired to say a few words. It happened, that at an earlier period of the present year, the state of Buenos Ayres had appointed a British subject, a gentleman who was a partner in a considerable mercantile house in this country, its Consul-General for England. In that capacity, the individual alluded to had called upon him, and, tendering his commission, had proposed to enter with him into the discussion of highly important questions. He had refused to listen to that gentleman, and even to see him a second time. He had taken that course, in the first place, because the appointment in question had not been regular; but he had felt another objection, and one of still greater importance. No man was ignorant of the speculations that were taking place in this country with regard to the continent of South America; and whoever considered what had been the fluctuation of various projects within the last year in this country, would probably see that he had only taken a proper precaution, when he had expressed a desire that the states of America, generally, would not appoint British merchants in this country to be their consuls. He had written to his Majesty's Charge d'Affaires at Buenos Ayres, and to the resident ministers at other places, requesting, through them, that such nominations might not take place in future. He had, moreover, written to the officers of this country appointed in America, generally, desiring that they would not engage in commercial transactions, under peril of removal from office.

Elective Franchise.

MONDAY, JUNE 30.—Lord Nugent presented a petition from the resident burgesses and others of West-Loose, praying inquiry into the right of voting in the borough, and complaining of infringement on the franchises as established by usage immemorial. Usage of this character need not, as he understood, be proved to have been unbroken: it would be enough to show that it had once existed: and he believed that unless a charter provided to the contrary, the common law right of voting was in every householder. Such was the opinion expressed in the time of James I. by Glanville, by Lord Coke, and all the great authorities of the time. The petition he held in his hand stated that, in the charter of West-Loose, there was nothing to abridge the rights of the resident inhabitants, and for centuries the right of election had been exercised by such residents alone—that afterwards by usurpation and collusion, non-resident burgesses had exercised a right of voting. Parliament was petitioned on this ground against the return of a member in 1823, and a committee of the house declared his return illegal; found that the right to elect was in the corporators; but did not decide who had a right to be corporators or how they should be chosen. The petitioners after this made many applications to the Court of King's Bench, and among others an application for a mandamus to be admitted and sworn into the corporation, according to the ancient usage of the borough and the clear meaning of the charter of Elizabeth; but the Court again refused their application, on the ground of want

Usage of this character need not, as he understood, be proved to have been unbroken: it would be enough to show that it had once existed; and he believed that unless a charter provided to the contrary, the common law right of voting was in every householder. Such was the opinion expressed in the time of James I. by Glanville, by Lord Coke, and all the great authorities of the time. The petition he held in his hand stated that, in the charter of West-Loose, there was nothing to abridge the rights of the resident inhabitants, and for centuries the right of election had been exercised by such residents alone—that afterwards by usurpation and collusion, non-resident burgesses had exercised a right of voting. Parliament was petitioned on this ground against the return of a member in 1825, and a committee of the house declared his return illegal; found that the right to elect was in the corporators; but did not decide who had a right to be corporators or how they should be chosen. The petitioners after this made many applications to the Court of King's Bench, and among others an application for a mandamus to be admitted and sworn into the corporation, according to the ancient usage of the borough and the clear meaning of the charter of Elizabeth; but the Court again refused their application, on the ground of want of jurisdiction and the general discussion of these subjects which would follow the granting of such an application (hear, hear).—The noble lord then contended that the petition, in effect, made out three things: first, the charter gave the right of voting to the resident house-holders; secondly, that the records proved the returns to have been made by them for a long period, under the titles of burgesses or resiant burgesses, or probi homines or communitas, or some name which, taken with the numbers, showed that there was no difference between the resiant burgesses and the free burgesses. Thirdly, that the right had been abridged by collusion and injustice, and finally altogether usurped by the non-resident burgesses, whose votes were not admissible by the charter. He had several petitions of the same nature to bring up, and early in the next session he proposed to bring the whole question forward in a manner suitable to the importance of the occasion.

Mr. D. Gilbert thought of all tribunals this house the worst to try such a question. The courts of law were open, and a proceeding was to be brought to a hearing in the Court of King's Bench to-morrow, on the matters recited in that very petition.

Lord John Russell said, that, in his opinion, the representative system would not be at all improved, if the rights of voting were extended to all householders. Such an alteration would be merely changing the elections from a select body to persons almost paupers. But the question now to be considered was, whether it was not the duty of that house to give to persons the means of proving their right to vote at elections; for, by the present state of the laws, persons were often deprived of such opportunities. The Court of King's Bench could not be said, in any general sense, to afford to constituents the means of proving their rights to vote. In the last application to the Court of King's Bench on the subject, by the inhabitants of West Looe, one party alone was put to the expense of 1,500*l.*, and he need not say how extremely numerous must be the cases in which individuals could not have the means of establishing their rights by any such expensive applications. He therefore approved of appointing a Committee upon the subject, not for the sake of the petitioners only, but for the sake of the constituent body of England generally. The powers of the Grenville committees were too limited to do justice to the elective body. In the memorable case of the corrupt election for Grampound, a Committee was appointed under the Grenville Act, and it returned that the sitting members had been duly elected; yet, after this, it was proved before a committee of the whole house, that 8,000*l.* had been paid to secure the returns of those very members. If the present question were in any shape pending, or about to be brought before the Court of King's Bench, it was an application of individuals for personal redress, but before that house it was a question of general rights, and in such matters the House of Commons was alone competent to interfere. Something ought to be done, for the determinations of that house under the Grenville Act, were often the most corrupt determinations, influenced by party motives. How often were the decisions of Committees no more than mere orders that the descendants of some corrupt nominee of Lord Orford, or of Sir Robert Walpole, should inherit the boroughs, which their ancestors had obtained by a Minister's violating the laws, and the rights of election. The Committee to be appointed ought to go into the whole subject.

Mr. Sturges Bourne complained that the Noble Lord had travelled out of the petition before the house, converting a subject of private complaint into a general question of election. If such a Select Committee as the Noble Lord alluded to were to be appointed for any such objects as he contemplated, it would have to settle the question of large properties, without the power of examining any evidence upon oath. The expenses of applications to the Court of King's Bench arose out of the necessity of bringing witnesses to London, and he should like to know how this could be avoided by appointing any committee upon the subject.

Lord John Russell said, that when a committee was appointed, the expenses of evidence ought to be paid by the public, as was the case in the Grampound Election committee.

Mr. Denman wished to give the House one example of the extraordinary manner in which the power of Government could dispose of elections. In the celebrated Westminster election of 1788, a question arose whether the tenants of St. Martin's-le-Grand had a right to vote. The Committee decided in the negative; and Lord John Townshend was declared to be the sitting Member. These tenants petitioned again the next year, and they had then nobody to oppose them, for nobody was immediately concerned, or had any interest at stake in getting rid of these one or two thousand voters. The consequence was, that the rights of these voters were acknowledged, and they had continued to be undisturbed. The Grenville Act might be a good act for deciding disputes between party and party, but the question before the house, was a question of general interest, and ought to be carefully and impartially investigated.—The petition was then read.

Interested Votes.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 23.—Mr. Byng moved the second reading of the bill for the iron railway in the Isle of Dogs.

Mr. Grenfell regretted that the hon. member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hume) was not present, as the house must now feel the propriety of acting upon the proposition which his hon. friend had made yesterday, that members interested should retire without voting. He (Mr. G.) was for carrying that principle farther. He would not only have any member prevented from voting on a private bill, whose private interest might lead him to support the bill; he would also exclude all those who had an interest directly opposed to the bill; and if the hon. member (Mr. Hume) would not, he pledged himself that at the earliest opportunity he would submit a measure to the house for that purpose.

Mr. Brougham observed, that the present subject was one which affected, in no ordinary degree, the interests of the public and the character of the House of Commons. He had long been a witness of the reprehensible manner in which private business was conducted, and for that reason had uniformly refused to give his vote, either one way or the other, on any private bill; except in one instance, the Highgate Chapel bill, which, conceiving it to partake of the nature of a public measure, and to be a gross job of certain attorneys, who were influenced, not by a love of piety, but by a love of being paid their costs, he certainly opposed. He perfectly agreed in the propriety of disallowing the votes of any hon. members who were interested in private bills. But he did not see how the house could stop there. He did not see why the vote of any hon. member who was interested in a private bill should be refused, and why the same individual should be permitted by himself or by his agents to canvas the other members of the house, either personally or by letter, "intreating their vote and interest." To him, this appeared much the greater evil of the two. During the discussion on the Highgate Chapel bill, to which he had already alluded, he was about to relate an anecdote, when he was stopped, probably from the house not liking to have its feelings hurt, or its misconduct exposed, and being apprehensive that he was about, with too rude a hand, to tear the veil from its mysteries (a laugh). The anecdote related, however, to a matter which had long been a subject of notoriety, shame, and reproach; it was this—Before he had the honour of a seat in that house, he was once engaged as a counsel against a private bill. The proceedings in the committee upon the bill, instead of being carried on, as he feared too frequently was the case, with irregularity and at random, were conducted with as much decorum and solemnity as if the committee were one formed under the Grenville act. The same twenty members sat every day, and sat from an early hour until the meeting of the house, or half an hour after. They heard evidence; they heard the objections of counsel to evidence; they behaved as if they were a select election committee; in short, he never witnessed a more zealous and satisfactory investigation. Now for the result. He and the opposers of the bill, by the evidence which had been adduced, and the real strength of the case, had gained the support of sixteen out of the twenty members of the committee. At the instant, however, at which the vote was called for, down came a learned friend of his, who had been employed in support of the bill, swept all the committee rooms in the house, and brought twenty members with him, who, of course, overpowered the sixteen that had declared themselves hostile to the bill, and carried it triumphantly. This, however, was a little too much. The matter was represented to the house, and the bill was thrown out, not at all on its merits, but on the circumstance which he had described. It was a well-known principle of our constitution, that persons on a jury should not determine on the rights of private property, without fully examining the claims of the parties. The members of that house, however, did so without hesitation. They allowed themselves to be influenced, not by justice, but by favour and affection. The very men who would shudder at the notion of so conducting themselves on a jury, would, in a committee-room of that house, decide ignorantly, shamelessly, and without compunction. He had no objection to any hon. member's voting in a committee on a private bill; but then it ought to be in consequence of his having made up his mind upon the evidence and argument; it ought to be because he thought the bill should or should not pass, but not because A or B requested him to vote so or so. But if hon. members who were interested in private measures were to be disqualified from voting upon them, why should the disqualification stop there? It was true that private business was very important; but was it as important as public business? Why should a lord of the Admiralty be permitted to vote on the motion of the hon. baronet the member for Newcastle, to reduce the number of the Board? Why should borough owners be allowed to vote against parliamentary reform? Why should those who fatten on the public purse be allowed to vote against economy? Why should persons in place and office, be permitted to vote, year after year, against the motion of the hon. member for Wareham, for abolishing the salt duties, the abolition of which might certainly tend to prevent them from having "salt to their porridge" (a laugh)? He hoped, however, a better plan would be devised for conducting the private business than that which was at present the reproach of the house.

Mr. Baring agreed in the observation that the practice of voting on private bills was a shame and reproach to the honour and character of parliament. He thought that it might be advisable to adopt some mode of balloting for private committees, as in the case of election committees, with power to strike out names known to be interested, and confine the voting to those left; or else to circumscribe that privilege by confining it to those who had listened to the arguments and evidence.

Colonel Davies strongly objected to any attempt at limiting the votes of members, who were bound to obey their constituents either in supporting or opposing the bill with all their power and influence. He did not believe that the constitution had any such power as to take away or qualify that right of voting from the members.

Mr. Calcraft could not see so much danger as was apprehended from interested votes, considering how efficient the forms of the house were to check jobbing and corruption, and how numerous the opportunities for exposing them in the course of passing a bill through both houses. There were, he conceived, checks enough in the house already to prevent the private business from being improperly carried through parliament, without resorting to new measures. If gentlemen who were in parliament could not be trusted with the impartial consideration of measures of this nature, in God's name let them be sent about their business, and let the country select proper persons to perform their legislative duties (hear). He had often, and no doubt would again, have to find fault with the corrupt decisions of majorities of that house, but certainly never with reference to private business. If individuals could be supposed capable of acting under bias in matters of a private nature, they were totally unfit for the performance of public duties; because, in those cases, the temptation was far more strong than in cases of a private description. He had rarely taken any part with reference to bills of this sort, nor did he recommend those who had any interest in private measures to do so. But he thought it was too much to describe the house to be so constructed, that when such bills came before them, their consideration should be referred to a separate tribunal, instead of being decided on by the members generally. By adopting such a plan, they would be controlled in minor points, whilst all the great business of the empire would be left to their honour and integrity.

Mr. Bright was not of the opinion of the hon. gent. when he said that the private business of that house was conducted with perfect parity. That he must deny. Decisions were very often made by persons who knew nothing about the business on which they voted. This showed that the private business was not carried on in such a way as to give satisfaction to the country and the sutor.

Mr. Hume gave notice, that he would on Friday submit a motion to determine how far the custom of parliament allowed the admissibility of the votes of members on bills in the success of which they were interested. The practice of parliament had hitherto been sufficient for every purpose of the due regulation of voting in that house; and the rules formerly laid down would, in his opinion, prevent individuals from voting on measures which affected their own interests. Another point of great importance must also be decided—namely, whether individuals, whose particular interests were hostile to a bill, ought to be allowed to oppose it.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that, theoretically, the present mode of voting on private bills seemed to be bad; but, practically, no mischief appeared to have arisen from the way in which the private business was conducted (hear, hear). It would be found exceedingly hard to deal with this question. Direct interest might easily be made out; but very great difficulty would be found in proving such an indirect interest as ought to prevent a member from voting on any particular question (hear, hear). The committee of last year took great pains to sift the subject; and the learned gent. below him (Mr. Brougham) was exceedingly anxious that the system of ballot should be introduced; but so many objections were urged against it, that it was refused. The best mode was, he thought, to leave the matter to the honourable feelings of gentlemen themselves. He had in his possession letters, addressed to members of parliament, by persons connected with private bills, which, if he were to read, would shame their measures out of the house. It was astonishing that individuals should so far lose their feelings as men, and make such applications to members of parliament as those to which he had alluded.

Here the discussion terminated.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16. — Mr. Hume submitted to the house a resolution "that no member should vote for or against any question in which he had a direct pecuniary interest." At a very early period in the history of parliament, it had been found inconvenient and unjust that members should be allowed to vote on subjects in which they had a direct interest. It had therefore been provided by the house, that no member should be allowed to vote in favour of any measure, in the passing of which he was personally or pecuniarily concerned. But there had never been an order that such members as were similarly interested in opposing a bill should also be disqualified from voting on it. It was to this latter point that his present motion more particularly referred, and which, he thought, was not less just nor less important than that which had already been provided for. He was prepared to believe, that the house would not deal hastily with this proposition, nor agree to a resolution which should so materially alter the practice of parliament; but if it could be proved that the existing law in this respect was unjust in itself, and injurious in its effect upon the interests of individuals, (and he did not doubt that he should afford such proof in a very ample and satisfactory manner), he trusted that it would not be thought beneath the dignity of parliament to abrogate that law, and to establish such an alteration as might seem necessary. As the parliament was the highest tribunal in the country, so it ought to be in all respects the purest. In all the inferior courts, it was a rule as old as their establishment, that no person should be engaged in the administration of justice in a cause which involved, or might be supposed to involve, any pecuniary interest or any personal feeling applying to himself. If, then, this precaution had been adopted in inferior branches of the constitution, how much the more necessary did it become to remove every ground of suspicion that the interests of members of parliament might, by any possibility, prevail so far as to bias the resolutions of the house? But the more he had considered it, the more of difficulty he was ready to confess presented itself in the manner of applying a remedy to what he believed a great evil (hear, hear). It was almost impossible to compare the proceedings of that house with those of any of the inferior tribunals to which he had alluded. Still, as a part of the principle on which his resolution was grounded was admitted, by disqualifying the votes of persons interested for,—and a part of it denied, by receiving the votes of persons interested against such measures,—the obvious inconsistency of the present practice was such as demanded a remedy. The first case which he could find on the records of the house which bore upon the question, occurred, in 1604, with regard to a member named Seymour. A bill for settling the lands of the deceased Duke of Somerset, was offered to the question of commitment by Mr. Speaker. It was moved by Sir Edward Stafford, that Mr. Seymour, a member of the house, and a party, might go forth during the debate, which was conceived to be agreeable with former orders and precedents in like cases; and Mr. Seymour went presently forth at the door. It did not appear in this case whether the member was in favour of, or opposed to, the measure; but his having an interest in it was considered a sufficient reason for excluding him from the privilege of voting. The next case occurred in 1664. Sir Robert Paston, a member of the house, being interested in favour of a bill, his vote was objected to, and refused on that ground. In this case the vote of Sir Robert Paston would have been of great importance; for the numbers on the division, with respect to the passing of the bill, were 81 and 80. He had not met with any other precedent decidedly in point till 1797; and then he came to one which might, perhaps, remove the doubts of some hon. members as to the possibility of drawing a distinction between private interest and public duty. It would be recollected that the subscribers to what was called the loyalty loan sustained a considerable loss by the fall in the price of the scrip; and to afford the original subscriber relief, a bill was introduced by Mr. Pitt, to give them a bonus of 5 per cent. on their stock. In the progress of the bill, an objection was taken to the votes of several members who were known to have subscribed to the loan, on the ground that they were personally interested in the success of the measure. The objection was, he believed, taken by the late Mr. Sheridan. A reference was made to the chair on the subject; the Speaker said, "I have always understood the rule and practice of the house to be, that no member can regularly (subject, however, to qualification) vote on any question which involves in it an immediate interest of such member. But when any measure is submitted to the house, the substance of which is to confer pecuniary advantage, or diminish a loss, which is the same thing, I am satisfied it is not consistent with that mode of proceeding which the house has adopted on occasions of delicacy and importance, that any member should vote on a measure by which he intends to derive any benefit in case that measure should be carried into a law. It is impossible not to consider the bill before the house as a measure of the former description." Mr. Manning—who was then, as now, a member of the house—and other members of the house thereupon stated, that as they were subscribers to the loan, and might be considered interested in the passing of the bill, they would not vote on the question, and they accordingly withdrew.—Two other members—the late Mr. George Rose was one—who were subscribers to the loan remained, and their votes were directly challenged by Mr. Tierney. They rose and declared that they did not intend to accept the bonus which was intended to be given by the bill, and contended that they, therefore, could not be considered as being interested in the measure. Having thus divested themselves of any personal interest in the bill, the votes of those members were allowed. These proceedings, however, met with considerable objection at the time. Mr. Ryder, a member, argued that the rule which had been laid down by the Speaker, would, if pushed to its utmost extent, prevent members from voting upon all measures of taxation; for every man was interested in preventing the imposition of burdens upon himself. After considerable debate, reference was again made to the Chair. The Speaker then stated, that "the cases put by the hon. member (Mr. Ryder) were all cases where the interest of members were merely eventual along with that of the rest of the community—the rule laid down was as to a direct and immediate interest." He (Mr. Hume) thought the distinction laid down by the Speaker in that case was clear, explicit, and rational, and might be followed on all future occasions. Another instance of challenging the vote of a member occurred in 1811, with respect to the grand junction canal bill; but he would pass that by, and come to another which occurred in July of the same year, when a bill, called the Bank-note bill, was brought into the house, the object of which was to render Bank-notes current in the country. On that occasion the hon. member for Appleby (Mr. Creavey) objected to the votes of 45 Bank proprietors—that was the number in the house then—on the ground that as the operation of the bill would increase the property of the Bank of England, they, as proprietors, were interested in its passing, and should not be allowed to vote. Mr. Manning, who was the Governor of the Bank, said to the house on the part of the proprietors, "We may or may not be interested in the measure, but it is not one which we have asked for: the measure has been introduced by Government, on the ground that it is necessary for the general welfare of the state, and not for our immediate and direct interest, consequently we ought not to be deprived of the right of voting on the question." Appeal being made to the Speaker, he said, "The rule was very plain. If they opened their journals, they would find it established 200 years ago, and then spoken of as an ancient practice, that a personal interest in a question disqualified a member from voting. But this interest, it should be further understood, must be a pecuniary interest, and separately belonging to the persons whose votes were questioned, and not in common with the rest of His Majesty's subjects, or on a matter of state policy. So it was that on a canal bill, a person whose name was down as a subscriber could not vote. On the same principle the question raised on the loyalty loan bill was rightly decided; for that was neither more nor less than to give a pecuniary remuneration to persons who had sustained a loss. It was equally clear that the house had done well on questions of taxation, or colonial policy, which were held not to disqualify any votes. Such was the law on the subject. How far the fact applied in the present case he left it to the house to decide." The question was then put and negatived without a division. He would now direct the attention of the house to another case explanatory of the practice of the house, which he had omitted to quote in the proper place. In 1623, a bill was brought in, entitled "an act for reversing and making void a decree made in the Chancery, and all orders and injunctions thereupon had and made against the Masters and Fellows of Magdalen-College, in Cambridge, and John Smyth, lessee, at the suit and prosecution of the Right Honourable Henry Earl of Oxford, Thomas Wood, and others, for a house and ground without Aldgate, London, contrary to the statutes of Elizabeth and common law of the land." Sir W. Earl moved that Dr. Gooch, the master of the college, ought to withdraw, he being a party interested in the bill. After some discussion, a resolution passed that Dr. Gooch should be heard, and then withdraw. He would mention another case which he thought was of some importance. On the 25th of April, 1621, a bill was introduced, entitled an "Act for the improvement of trade." An objection was taken to the votes of members of corporations, on the ground that they, being connected with monopolies, had a personal interest in opposing the bill, and the house determined that the objection was good. Having stated these precedents, he left it to the house to decide whether it would not be desirable that they should place themselves in such a situation as to convince the country that every measure introduced into that house would receive a fair and impartial consideration (hear). Without detaining the house longer he would submit a resolution drawn up in the words of the former Speaker, in the case of the loyalty loan bill, namely—"That no member shall vote for or against any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest."

Mr. Littleton had no doubt that the hon. member was correct when he said that he had found great difficulty in coming to a determination as to the mode of treating this question. He had no doubt that when he first gave notice of his motion, he did not anticipate the difficulties which he afterwards experienced. Two years ago he (Mr. Littleton) had given notice of a motion somewhat similar to that which the hon.

member had submitted to the house. But that motion he was obliged to abandon, because he found that the objections to it were insuperable. His motion was, however, confined to the finding a remedy for that which he still considered a serious evil—namely, the manner in which private business was conducted in committees up stairs (hear, hear). In the house private interests were merged in the great mass of unbiassed opinion, and could produce little effect; but in committees on private bills, nobody but the parties interested ever thought of appearing, and it was there that the mischief was done. He thought that the house would gain nothing by departing from its ancient usage. Under the present system, this advantage was apparent—that it was well-known what individuals were interested in any measure before the house. Votes on private bills were so seldom challenged, that members did not think it necessary to conceal their interest in particular measures. But when once the present motion should be carried, members would be driven to resort to evasive measures. They would buy shares in the names of friends, and so have an opportunity of advocating their private interests in that house under the pretence of performing a public duty (hear). In many instances the interests of county members were identified with those of their constituents, and yet the effect of the motion would be to deprive those constituents of the services of the individuals who could best advance their object. There was another inconvenience which might arise from agreeing to the motion. Members might purchase an interest in one or two rival undertakings, in order to avoid being called upon to perform a duty in that house which might give offence to parties out of doors (hear). For these reasons, he thought it better to leave the ancient practice of Parliament untouched, and to allow every member to act as he felt due to his own character and honour: that, in his opinion, was the only moral restraint that could be imposed upon practices which certainly brought discredit on the house. He would therefore move the “previous question.”

Mr. Grenfell complained that he had been disqualified from voting on a question of great public importance on a former night, because he was known to have a private interest in the measure. It so happened, too, that on the very day when he had been disqualified, one of the hon. members for Grampound had signed a petition against the measure from the London Dock Company, in which it was stated that the measure affected their pecuniary interests (hear, hear). The principle of exclusion ought to be applied to both sides, or not at all—to those who had an interest in opposing, as well as to those whose interest it would be to support any measure. In his opinion it would be extremely unwise to accede to the motion; for if it were agreed to, half the time of the house would be wasted in finding out what members were interested in the measures before the house (hear, hear).

Mr. H. Sumner said, that if the amendment had not been moved, he had intended to have proposed a resolution declaratory of the opinion of the house, that it was derogatory from the honour of a member to vote in any question wherein he had a pecuniary interest. As it was, he would vote for the amendment.

Sir M. W. Ridley thought it would be advisable for the house to pass some declaratory resolution of the nature alluded to by the hon. member (Mr. Sumner), as a guide for their conduct on all future occasions. He would vote for the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Littleton), in the hope that some such resolution might subsequently be proposed.

Mr. Peel expressed his regret, not that the motion had been made, but that there should have been any necessity for making it. He thought it would be extremely difficult to come to any resolution on the subject. He intended to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Staffordshire, by doing which he should not be precluded from hereafter adopting any measure which he should think applicable to the subject. There were three courses which it was open to the house to pursue. The first was to adopt the motion of the hon. member for Aberdeen; the second was to pass a declaratory resolution to the effect proposed by the member for Surrey; and the third was to agree to the amendment proposed by his hon. friend the member for Staffordshire. There were, in his opinion, great difficulties in the way of the adoption of the original motion. In the first place, without entering into any nice disquisition, the right of disqualifying members from voting was one which the house ought to exercise with great caution (hear, hear). Members were sent to that house to perform duties to others. He was not certain that if he were called upon to come to a decision on the question a priori—that is to say, if there were no precedents on the subject—he would ever consent to any law by which a member could be disqualified from voting on any question. He should have felt a priori great doubts of the competency of parliament to disqualify a member from exercising his discretion, even on questions in which he had a direct personal interest (hear). Might it not happen that a member's private interest would be concurrent with the interests of his constituents (hear)? He objected to the extension of the principle of disqualification which was proposed by the motion (no, from Mr. Hume). If the motion were not intended to extend the law of disqualification, he asked the hon. member to leave it as it stood (hear). He thought the hon. member's proposition was to come to them recommended by the consideration of novelty—that it was to determine what was doubtful, and supply what was wanting. Imperfect legislation on the subject—and it was legislation as far as they were concerned—he deemed most unwise. The effect of the motion would only be to divert the influence which was now openly avowed into secret channels (hear). He thought that the hon. member had not applied himself to the correction of the great evil of which there was cause to complain—he meant the system of canvassing for votes on private committees (hear). That which was a matter of notoriety was not so much to be dreaded as that which was transacted in privacy. If he knew any member to be interested in a measure, he could challenge him before the house, and put it to his honour whether he could vote on the question, and such an appeal would not be made in vain. He certainly would prefer to the motion such a resolution as that proposed by the hon. member for Surrey, although he was not prepared to say that he would adopt even that. The better way would be for the house to act upon each individual case, without laying down any general rule.

Mr. Hudson Gurney mentioned a case in which an hon. member had been offered shares at a very favourable rate by the committee of a company, and in the postscript of the letter that contained that offer it was said, "the committee rely on your best exertions on all occasions to promote the interest of the project." The hon. gent. had refused to take any shares on those terms, and had gone into the public market for them, and purchased them at 50 per cent. advance.

Mr. C. W. Wynn thought the object of the present motion would be a great measure be answered by enforcing what was the law in the house. That law was, that the vote of any member on a bill in which he had a direct pecuniary interest should not be allowed (hear, hear). There were a great many analogous cases where the principle was recognized. Thus, in a discussion with respect to a member's seat—in questions which affected a member's conduct, and which might afterwards be followed by the censure of the house, or on which an impeachment might be founded, the practice of parliament was to hear the member in his place, after which he always withdrew, without joining in the vote. He thought it better, therefore, to let the old and recognized law of parliament take its course. The house could not prevent any member from voting, but they might, in cases where he had a direct pecuniary interest, disallow his vote when that fact became known; it would be highly dangerous to extend the principle of disqualification, even if the house had the power of doing so.

Mr. Abercrombie admitted that this subject was attended with difficulties almost insurmountable. It might be hard to say, that a man should be allowed to vote in a case where he himself had a direct pecuniary interest; but the objection to his vote under such circumstances must be founded in attributing to him motives by which his mind was supposed to be more or less unfairly biased. If the house adopted this principle, they should carry it farther, and apply it to all cases where motives might be supposed to operate on the member's mind. As long as they continued to be human beings, they must be affected more or less in their actions by motives. In some instances those motives were bad; but, in such cases, he knew of no control over them but that of public opinion (hear, hear). What would be the operation of the principle now proposed to be enforced? A man who possessed one 100l. share in a company, it was declared ought not to be allowed to vote; but the constituents of that member might be extremely interested in the concern, and might instruct him to vote. His refusal would be at the risk of his seat. Thus they would have him balancing the shares on one side, and the seat on the other. Would it not be much better to leave this matter to take its course—to deal with each case as it arose, and not fetter themselves with a general rule. If they could not trust themselves to deal with such cases as they occurred, it would be better for them at once to depart the house. He admitted that this was brought on under particular circumstances, and in peculiar times, when speculation had gone to a very great height all over the country, and when members of that house were possessed of interests in them to a very considerable extent; but to assert that this would give to their votes a corrupt bias, would be going too far. But he did not admit that the house possessed the right of disqualifying any member. That was an infringement upon the rights of their constituents. He begged he might not be understood as denying the abuse which existed in committees up stairs; though he did not mean to say that these arose from corrupt motives. They rather, in most cases, arose from an obliging disposition which one individual was inclined to exercise towards another; but the mischief of it was, that this was exercised, in many instances, without the consideration, that in obliging a friend they adopted measures highly injurious to the interests of many individuals (hear, hear). It was not at all an uncommon thing—but in this he spoke more from the reports of others than his own personal observation—to hear members, when in committees up stairs, ask each other "Which party do you support? For whom do you come here to vote?" Now, this was a practice to which he should wish to see the whole weight of public opinion directed, but he thought public opinion alone could put it down (hear, hear).

Mr. Stuart Wortley admitted that great abuses existed in the present system of soliciting for votes in committees. This was the main evil, and it ought to be corrected; but he agreed that public opinion would be found its best corrective. To disqualify a man from voting who had a personal interest in a measure, would disqualify many persons who were the most active and efficient on committees; for he presumed if they were disqualified in the house, they would be also disqualified up stairs.

Sir E. Knatchbull denied that committees up stairs had acted in any corrupt or partial manner. If any instances of abuse occurred, what was there to hinder the parties aggrieved from appealing to the house for protection? And he begged to ask, whether any case was known in which such appeal had been made without effect?

Mr. Robertson supported the motion. When it was well known, that in most of the speculations now afloat in the city, some thousands of shares were reserved for the use of members of parliament, he thought it was high time that the subject should be taken into consideration. The fact was, that some of the wildest speculations were encouraged by the expected support of some members of that house.

Mr. Hume in reply said, that if he was before impressed with the necessity of the measure which he proposed to the house, he was still more convinced of it after what he had heard in the course of this discussion. It was stated by one rt. hon. gent. (Mr. C. W. Wynn), that the law of parliament on the question of members being disqualified from voting where they had a direct pecuniary interest, was clear and positive; but this was doubted by another rt. hon. gent. (Mr. Peel). Now he wished to have the matter set at rest by the declaration which he proposed. It was not he who violated any constitutional principles in this motion, but those who opposed it. It was admitted as a constitutional principle in all our courts, that no man could act as a judge in cases where he had a direct personal interest; and he thought it a violation of that principle that the House of Commons should be made an exception to it. However the motion might be disposed of, his object was in a great degree gained; for no man had attempted to im-pugn the general principle for which he contended.

The amendment of "the previous question" was then put, and carried without a division.

MONDAY, JUNE 20.—On a reading of the Berks and Hants Junction Canal bill, the Speaker wished to address the house in explanation of two points, which, though introduced into the consideration of the present bill, equally applied to every other bill of the same nature. It was supposed by some gentlemen that the law of Parliament disqualified members from voting upon private bills in which they had a direct interest. He wished to state that it was not the law, but the usage of Parliament, which occasioned that disqualification. The rule, however, was,—at least as he found it, and he had examined with accuracy,—that only parties were disqualified who had an interest in favour of a particular measure; not those who had an adverse interest. Now he submitted to the house, whether, in considering this subject of private bills, such a distinction ought to be drawn (hear, hear). The second point was as to the admissibility of witnesses to bills respecting which they had been also petitioners. He thought it very difficult to say how far a subscribing petitioner ought to be disqualified as a witness. He knew the supposed analogy on which the disqualification was founded, but he also knew how easily, by force, or fraud, or trick, a man might be entrapped into the situation of a petitioner, for the very purpose of creating his incompetency to be a witness, although he might be in a situation to give the best evidence upon the business. The better way would, he thought, be to receive the evidence of a party so situated, subject, of course, to observation on the nature of his personal interest.

Private Committees.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.—Mr. Littleton complained that the day fixed for proceeding on the Welch Iron and Coal Company's bill had been postponed for more than a month, to the great inconvenience of the parties who had been prepared, at great expense, to oppose the bill. It was now again postponed, and both these postponements had been without any notice. He therefore moved that the order for that committee be discharged.

Lord Milton seconded the motion.

The Speaker adverted to the hardship which such conduct as that of the persons concerned in this bill threw upon the parties. It was unjust to them, unsatisfactory to the public, and derogatory to the dignity of the house. He thought it was necessary for the house strongly to mark their sense of this neglect, and to rescind the order.

Sir J. Wrottesley stated, that not one of the members connected with the mining districts had been appointed on this committee. The expense to which parties were put by such practices called for some remedy, and he thought persons soliciting a private bill ought to enter into a recognizance for payment of the expenses, if it should appear they had no reasonable grounds for their project.

Mr. S. Wortley said, he had never, in the whole course of his experience, known a case of more gross and wanton neglect than that now before the house. The parties interested in opposing the bill had received not the slightest notice of the postponement. He concurred in the necessity of preventing such practices for the future.

Mr. Hume suggested that the best remedy for such abuses would be by throwing open committees, and subjecting them to the animadversions which they would receive through the medium of the public press, if their proceedings were reported, and the parties concerned in them known.

The question was then put, and the order for the meeting of the committee discharged.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.—Mr. C. Dundas moved the recommitment of the Hants and Berks Canal bill, on the ground that the question had been unfairly got rid of in the committee, by the votes of a number of members who had come down on one day without having attended the course of the proceedings.

Mr. Sturges Bourne said that, apart entirely from the merits of this bill, he would support its re-commitment upon what was stated to have occurred.

Mr. Fyfe Palmer said, that he had regularly attended the committee, and had opposed the bill because it was injurious to private property.

Sir Thomas Acland said, that the conduct of the committee compelled him to vote for the re-commitment of the bill.

Mr. Monck did not approve of the manner in which the committee had come to the vote; at the same time he thought that vote substantially just and consistent with the evidence. In justice to all the parties, supporters as well as opponents, he would recommend that the bill should be abandoned until next session, for it would be morally impossible to carry it through both houses in the present.

The bill was sent back to the committee for further consideration.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.—Mr. W. H. Whitbread presented a petition from the proprietors and promoters of the oil gas company, complaining of the manner in which (after an expense of 30,000l.) their bill had been thrown out in the committee. The hon. gent. contended at considerable length, that the conduct of private committees in general was full of injustice, and that it dissatisfied the public.

Mr. W. Smith was sure that the management of private committees called most loudly for reform.

Mr. Calcraft thought that interference was necessary, and that the earlier it took place the better. The true course, as it occurred to him, would be an act similar to the Grenville act, which regulated the election committees. For the practice, however, of coming down to vote without having heard any of the discussion upon the subject, that course was common to the house itself as well as to the divisions of it.

Mr. Sykes believed that, in the present Session, many projects of public utility had been defeated merely by the votes of those whose interests were personally opposed to them.

Mr. Littleton said that nothing could be more scandalous than the conduct of private committees; and until the system was altered, he would never sit in another.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.—Mr. Littleton said, that after what had been lately heard of the mode of transacting business in committees on private bills, some measure was necessary in order to correct the abuses which had sprung up. It was for the credit of the house, and for the advantage of the public, that some alteration should take place in the constitution of those committees. With this view, he would move that a select committee be appointed to take into consideration the constitution of committees on private bills, and to report their observations and opinions thereupon to the house.

Mr. S. Baines seconded the motion. The great evil, in his opinion, was the vast number of members appointed on private committees. He hoped that in future such committees would act more in the nature of juries.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee appointed.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.—Mr. Littleton postponed his resolutions concerning the management of business in private committees till next session.

Mr. Brougham had felt most severely the evils of the committees, as they had hitherto been composed. According to the practice of getting up committees, the crown obtained an influence over disputed questions of private property. The manner in which questions were decided in that House was well understood, and well appreciated by the public. The Treasury Bench had certain means of influencing all decisions. As the house was then constituted, it was difficult to devise any means of checking the evil practices which prevailed in committees upon private property. If such committees were to be thrown open to public notice, their practices might come nearer to justice and propriety. The making of the proceedings of such committees public, would have the same effect as that which was produced upon the conduct of the house, by admitting strangers into the gallery, and by the publication of the debates. There could be no question that the house of Commons would commit many egregious errors, and be guilty of much malversation, but for the efficacy of public opinion which was exercised upon their decisions by means of the publicity given to debates by the press. If the same publicity were given to the proceedings of the committees, the members of those Committees would be absolutely ashamed to do what they now did with very little hesitation.

Mr. P. Grenfell thought that no system that could possibly be introduced, could be worse than that which existed at present. The practices in Committees upon private property were such, that they could not stand the test of public opinion, and if the proceedings of such Committees were to be thrown open to the press, that in itself would be a great purification.

Mr. Croker said, that the present practice of the Clerks upon Committees, was only to take down the names of members sufficient to compose the committee; if they were to revert to the ancient practice of regularly noting each day the names of the members who attended, it would put a stop to the disgraceful occurrence of members making their appearance and voting at the close of the committee, when they had not attended to the prior proceedings, and, except from other sources, were almost ignorant of the questions upon which they voted.

Mr. Calcraft was convinced that justice had been done in every case; and he deprecated the idea of members consenting to put a stigma on their general conduct, when none of them could mention a single instance of abuse.

TUESDAY, MARCH 22.—Mr. Calcraft called the attention of the house to the great inconvenience which had been felt by many members attending private committees, for want of sufficient accommodation. There was at present a great press of private business going through select committees, and much confusion and delay had arisen from the want of a sufficient number of rooms where the committees might sit. On that very day he had seen not fewer than 150 persons sitting in the body of the house transacting business in private committees. Now, he was certain that nobody would object on the score of economy to having a sufficient number of rooms for the accommodation of members in their private committees. He was glad to mention this in the presence of one of his Majesty's ministers, who, he had no doubt, would feel disposed to take the matter into consideration, and to render every assistance. He could not avoid observing also on the state of the rooms to which private committees could have access. They were for the most part so narrow and confined, that members, witnesses, and other persons attending, were much annoyed by the heat and pressure. He trusted the attention of Government would be turned to this subject, and that some immediate steps would be taken to give an accommodation befitting members of the house, while acting in the discharge of so important a duty.

Mr. Stuart Wortley: It was a great obstruction to the progress of private business, to have (as was now frequently the case) two committees sitting at the same time in one and the same room, where it sometimes happened that two counsel were at the same moment speaking before each committee. This of course created great annoyance, and not seldom had the effect of rendering the observations of each unintelligible.

General Gaseoyne said, it sometimes happened that the whole of the members appointed on a committee could not obtain admission for want of room; or if they did, the room was so crowded that they could with the utmost difficulty pass from one side of the room to the other. It was not an uncommon thing to see one hundred members mixed with witnesses and strangers in the same room.

Mr. Peel assured the house that he would do all in his power to afford the desired remedy.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28.—Mr. S. Rice moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to give directions for building suitable committee-rooms, and a library for the reception of the printed books and papers belonging to the house."

The resolution was agreed to.

Breach of Privilege.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.—Mr. Peel had moved on a former day, that R. P. T. Pilkington should be committed to Newgate for having imposed upon a member of that house, by forging a petition on the subject of the Catholic claims. On the 17th of March a petition had been presented to the house, professing to be signed by 14 persons of Ballinasloe, in favour of the Catholic claims. The forged petition was signed by 13 out of the 14 names attached to the former, and sentiments had been attributed to the petitioners, the reverse of those which they entertained.

The Serjeant-at-Arms now reported that he had Robert Poer Trench Pilkington in custody, pursuant to an order of the house.

Mr. Peel moved that he be called to the bar.

Mr. Pilkington was then placed at the bar.

The Speaker.—Robert Poer Trench Pilkington, you have been examined before a committee of this house, and there acknowledged yourself the author of a petition, purporting to be from the Protestant inhabitants of Ballinasloe, in favour of Catholic emancipation; and this house has resolved, on the report of that committee, that you, having been proved to be the author of such counterfeit petition, and having forged the signatures thereto, and having sent it as a genuine petition to a member of this house, have been guilty of a high breach of the privilege of the house. You have now been called to the bar, in order that if you have any thing to say on the subject of your offence, which may affect the decision to which the house may come respecting you, you should state it. If, therefore, you have any thing to offer in extenuation of your conduct, the house is ready to hear you.

Mr. Pilkington.—I have only to say, that I confess myself guilty of a very foolish act. As the only reparation in my power, I hastened to obey the summons of the committee, and there to confess myself the sole author of the petition, and to assure the committee, that no person whatever but myself was in any way connected with the petition. I am extremely sorry for what I have done, and am ready to submit myself to the decision of the house on my conduct. I have only to add, that since I have been in custody, I have been in an infirm state of health so as to require medical assistance.

The prisoner was then ordered into custody, and in consideration of his candour, Mr. Peel said he would move to-morrow, that he should be discharged on Monday. Upon a petition to the house, he was consequently discharged the Monday following without payment of fees; his petition stating that he was unable to pay them.

Printing Evidence.

THURSDAY, MAY 12.—Mr. Kennedy moved that the evidence taken before the committee on the Leith Dock Bill be printed.

The Speaker observed, that the house ought to be obliged to the hon. member (Mr. Kennedy) for the manner in which he had brought the subject forward, because an erroneous idea had gone forth, that any person, without leave, and having no responsibility, might print evidence taken before a committee of that house. To do so was, however, a breach of privilege. In cases of this nature, when application was made to have evidence printed the expense must be incurred by the party applying for that evidence, and it must be printed from the Commons' copy. When permission was given to the party applying to print evidence, it was accompanied by an order to the printer of the House of Commons to print such evidence if it were called for. If this order were not sent forth, parties desirous of procuring such evidence would be placed in this situation—that the House of Commons' printer might refuse to comply with the request to have such evidence printed.—Motion agreed to.

Parliamentary Documents.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14.—Mr. S. Rice moved for the appointment of a select committee on the state of the papers printed by order of the House of Commons from the year 1800 to the accession of his present Majesty. He observed, that since the year 1800 the parliamentary papers had not been collated or arranged. A committee had, in 1802, been appointed to inquire into the state of the papers presented to the house, and in consequence of the report of that committee the documents were selected and classed. The papers thus arranged, were now known by the title of "The Seventeen Volumes of Reports." A number of most valuable documents were at that time preserved and put in order, which were now accessible to the house and the public. From that period to the accession of his present Majesty, many important documents had been presented to Parliament; but they had not yet been arranged so as to render them essentially useful to members of Parliament. His motion, therefore, was for the appointment of a committee to select from those documents such as appeared to be most valuable and important. The hon. gent. observed, that the house had derived great benefit from the library which had been established by the late Speaker; and the effect of his motion would be to give still greater scope to the arrangement which had originated with that individual. He concluded by moving for the appointment of a committee.

Mr. Croker gave the motion his most cordial support. The documents alluded to would form one of the most curious illustrations that could be imagined, of the history of this country. He believed, that the truth of very few political facts, connected with the history of the reign of George III., could be correctly ascertained without the assistance of those documents.

The motion was then agreed to, as was a second, giving instruction to the said committee to look out for some proper place for the safe custody of the books and papers, to which the members of the house could have the most convenient access.

Expenses of Printing Petitions, &c.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28.—On the presentation of the petition of the City of London against the Corn Laws,

Mr. C. Calvert took occasion to call the attention of the house to the enormous expense which the country was put to for the printing of all these petitions. There were many of the less important kind that it might be quite sufficient merely to enter on the journals of this house, in such a manner, however, as to distinguish their prayer and object. Hon. gentlemen, in some cases, might content themselves with having them read, as an hon. friend of his, for example (Mr. W. Gordon), who had just now presented about a dozen petitions on the same subject from the same county, the greater number of which were most likely verbatim et literatim the same.

Call of the House.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14.—On a motion for leave of absence for a member for a fortnight, on urgent private business,

Sir J. Newport rose to declare, that he would divide the house against every motion of this kind which was not accompanied with a medical certificate of incapacity to attend. The importance of the question to be taken into consideration on the night for which he had moved for the call of the house was such as to render the absence of any member, on any other account, totally inexcusable. He was determined to enforce the call, and to oppose the grant of leave of absence in any other cases than those attested by medical certificate of incapacity to attend.

Several motions of this kind were made notwithstanding; and leave was obtained.

On Wednesday, July 6th, the Parliament was prorogued by Commission from his Majesty.

The Commons being summoned to the House of Lords in the usual form, and the commission being read, the Lord Chancellor read the following speech :—

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

The business of the session being now brought to a conclusion, we are commanded by His Majesty to express the great satisfaction which he feels in releasing you from your laborious attendance in Parliament.

His Majesty returns you his warmest acknowledgments for the zeal and assiduity with which you have prosecuted the inquiries into the state of Ireland, which he recommended to you at the opening of the session. It is a particular gratification to his Majesty, that the tranquillity and improved condition of that part of the United Kingdom have rendered the extraordinary powers with which you had invested his Majesty no longer necessary for the public safety.

His Majesty is happy to be able to announce to you, that he receives from all Foreign Powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country, and of their desire to maintain the general peace.

While his Majesty regrets the continuance of the war in the East Indies with the Burmese Government, he trusts that the gallant exertions of the British and Native forces employed in operations in the enemy's territory may lead to a speedy and satisfactory termination of the contest.

“ Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

We have it in command from his Majesty to thank you for the supplies which you have granted to him for the service of the present year, and at the same time to express the satisfaction which he derives from the reduction you have found it practicable to make in the burdens of his people.

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

His Majesty has commanded us to assure you, that he is highly sensible of the advantages which must result from the measures you have adopted in the course of this session, for extending the commerce of his subjects by the removal of unnecessary and inconvenient restrictions, and from the beneficial relaxations which you have deemed it expedient to introduce into the colonial system of this country.

These measures, his Majesty is persuaded, will evince to his subjects in those distant possessions, the solicitude with which Parliament watches over their welfare: they tend to cement and consolidate the interests of the colonies with those of the mother country, and his Majesty confidently trusts that they will contribute to promote that general and increasing prosperity, on which his Majesty had the happiness of congratulating you on the opening of the present session, and which, by the blessing of Providence, continues to pervade every part of his kingdom.”

The Lord Chancellor then signified his Majesty's Royal will and pleasure, that the present Parliament be prorogued to Thursday, the 25th day of August next, to be then and here holden; to which day it was prorogued accordingly.

PARLIAMENTARY REVIEW.

PARLIAMENTARY REVIEW.

IRELAND.

The ADDRESS—Catholic Association—Catholic Claims—Elective Franchise—Provision for Catholic Clergy—Church Establishment, &c.

It is now our duty, conformably with the plan of this work, to pass judgment upon that portion of the proceedings of Parliament, a report of which is contained under the general head of Ireland.

These proceedings divide themselves into two parts; the one consisting of acts, the other of discussions: the one comprising what was done, by one or other House, as a body; the other, what was said, by individual members.

In our examination of what was done, it will be necessary to state our own opinions on the great public questions which occupied the attention of Parliament; to assign the grounds of those opinions, without which neither our opinions, nor those of any one, are worth regarding; and, lastly, to examine how far what was done, did or did not accord with what, in our estimation, ought to have been done.

In our examination of what was said, it will be our duty to scrutinize rigidly the arguments advanced on both sides of every question; to expose the shifts and pretences of a bad cause, and rid a good one of those bad arguments by which its real merits are often so materially obscured.

When a ground shall thus have been laid for passing a deliberate judgment upon the conduct, both of the legislature as a whole, and of every member of it individually; something more will be necessary, to give to this part of our work all the utility of which it is susceptible.

Though many proceedings in Parliament are very important in their effects, few of them are so important in their effects, as they are in their causes. When an event, in addition to whatever good or evil may result immediately from itself, gives indication of the existence of a cause, from which an indefinite number of events of like tendency may be expected to flow; an estimate of its importance would be very imperfect, in which this indication should not be included.

The actions of public, like those of private, men, are governed by their interests. Their interests result directly from the institutions under which they live: if these be good, public men have no interest that is not in unison with the interest of the community: under bad institutions, their interest is frequently different from, and even opposite to, that of the community. Accordingly, the working of good or bad institutions may always be traced in the conduct of public men. If the institutions be good, their conduct is directed towards the advantage of the community, which in that case is also their own. If the institutions be bad, they pursue either their individual interest, or that of the class, or party, to which they belong; and the interest of the community is sacrificed.

In our comments, therefore, upon the proceedings in Parliament, we shall endeavour, in each instance, to bring to view, not only the events themselves, but their causes; viz.—the interests, generated by political institutions, and variously modified by those numerous and diversified circumstances which compose what is termed the spirit of the age.

In all these points of view, few events will demand a greater share of our attention, than the proceedings of the last session in regard to the Catholics of Ireland. The range of these proceedings took in, not one only, but several great questions: the Catholic Association; the Catholic Claims; and the two measures, called the wings. On each of these, rooted prejudices exist: the merits, therefore, of the different questions must be entered into, at least sufficiently to place every conclusion upon evidence sufficient to support it. The multiplicity of arguments, or what passed under that name, which were brought forward by all parties, render a proportional number of words necessary for making a due estimate of their validity: and finally, discussions, in which almost every prominent person in both Houses took a part, bore unusually strong marks of that general character which is impressed upon British statesmen by British institutions, and by the particular stage of intellectual and moral improvement at which the British nation has arrived.

The main question—that of Catholic emancipation—is, in our opinion, by no means a difficult one: and that any person capable of reasoning should feel a moment's doubt upon the subject, would surprise us, if we did not know that the strongest reasoning powers desert their possessor, when he is frightened. With all opponents of the Catholic Claims, in whose instance private interest is out of the question, the contest is simply, as it seems to us, between the great principles of justice on the one hand, and vague apprehensions on the other.

The public mind, in this country, is now so far advanced, that we may affirm, without hazard of being openly contradicted, even by those who would contradict us if they dared, that to subject any person to temporal inconvenience in any shape, on the ground of his religious opinions, is, primâ facie, injustice and oppression: that it cannot be justified on any such ground as that his religion is bad, or unacceptable in the sight of God: nor by any thing but the certainty, or at least a preponderant probability, that some great temporal calamity will befall the rest of the community, unless averted by imposing restraints, disabilities, or penalties, upon persons of some particular faith. It will also be allowed, that, if there be a danger, and if security against that danger require the imposition of disabilities on account of religious opinions; at least no disability should exist which does not, in some way or another, conduce to the end in view; that end being, security. We might join issue on both points, and maintain, not only the non-existence of danger, but the existence of disabilities, which, with whatever view they were imposed, can under no conceivable supposition (except that of extreme mental imbecillity) be now maintained, with any such view as that of guarding against danger. But as we have not space to argue both these questions, we will confine ourselves to the first and most important.

Before we can be called upon to say, what the danger is not, we are entitled to expect that the opponents of Catholic emancipation will declare what it is. This, however, the greater number of them would find an embarrassing question: accordingly few of them have ever attempted to answer it. So vague and indefinite are those fears, on the ground of which they are willing to degrade five or six millions of their countrymen to the condition of an inferior caste, that if they were asked what great calamity it is which they apprehend from the concession of the Catholic claims, we doubt whether one in ten of them could tell. What they have in their minds is an indistinct feeling that the Catholics are dangerous persons: and this being assumed, it never occurs to them to consider, whether the Catholics not emancipated are not fully as dangerous as the Catholics emancipated would be.

We will concede one point, about which there has been much unprofitable discussion: that no confidence is to be reposed in the professions of the Catholics; that, whatever they may now say, or think, they would not be satisfied with equality, if they could obtain superiority. We know of no body of men who would. We have no doubt—it would be absurd to doubt—that the Catholic clergy would willingly possess themselves of the temporalities of the Protestant Church; that the Catholic nobility and gentry, in destroying Protestant ascendancy, would willingly supply its place by the ascendancy of their own creed; and that the great body of the Catholics would gladly embrace any opportunity, and any means, of making their own religion the dominant religion of the state. We will even allow that they would aim at the suppression of all other religions, by persecution: for this is no more than has been done by Catholics; and not by Catholics only, but, in every age and country, by that sect of religionists who have been uppermost, as far as they have dared.

That the Catholic aristocracy and clergy should desire a monopoly of political power, and of the wealth which that power affords, is no more than natural. The propensity to pursue their own interests, is not peculiar to Catholic human beings. To persecute, indeed, is not the interest of any sect: and this the majority of every sect would see, if they were wise. But the majority of every sect has hitherto been unwise: accordingly no sect (with at most but one or two exceptions) which has had the power to persecute, has ever failed to make use of it. The Romish Church persecuted, and does persecute, wherever it is strong enough: so did the Church of England, as long as it was strong enough; so did the Greek Church; so did the Presbyterian.

Now, therefore, when we have made every concession against the Catholics which the most unreasonable opponent could demand, we require of our antagonists, in our turn, that they will find some better ground for imposing disabilities upon millions of human beings, than the mischief which it is feared they would do, if it were but in their power.

If the Catholic disabilities were upheld as a measure of hostility, it would be fit to consider whether the Catholics were proper objects of hostility. But as they are professedly measures, not of hostility, but of security; the question, and the only question, is, not what the Catholics would be willing, but what they would be able, to do.

It is hard to guess what precise evil the fears of most of the Anti-Catholic orators point to. Some of them talk of a divided allegiance. "The Protestant" says Lord Liverpool, "gives an entire allegiance to his sovereign; the Catholic, a divided one. The service of the first is complete, of the last only qualified*."

Now, if by the sovereign be meant the king, we should be sorry to think that every, or any, Protestant gave to his sovereign an unqualified allegiance. If allegiance mean obedience, and what else it can mean we know not, an entire allegiance is suitable only to a despotic government. What there is of meaning in this accusation, must be, that the Catholics acknowledge a foreigner as the head of their church, to whose interests, it is imagined, they are disposed to sacrifice the interests of their country. That there is a party of persons, professing the Catholic faith, who are so disposed, is true: that this party is any thing but a small minority, is not true: for, if it were, what must be the situation, we do not say of Protestant states in which Catholics lie under no disqualifications, but of countries in which a vast majority of the people are Catholics, as France, Austria, and Spain? If the authority of the Pope be there paramount to that of the temporal sovereign; if the Pope be there suffered to depose kings; the danger apprehended is real: if not, it is imaginary.

The few Anti-Catholics who can tell what they are afraid of, seem chiefly to fear that the Catholics would attempt to subvert the established church; and this is the only tangible ground which they have assigned for their alarm.

In the first place, then, we think we may lay it down as an indisputable axiom, that the re-establishment of Catholicism, as the dominant religion in this country, is an event quite beyond the range of human probability. That six millions of persons, not having the powers of government in their hands, should either convert or conquer twelve millions, does not seem a very probable contingency. If probable at all, however, it is more probable before emancipation than after: since the power, whether of converting or of conquering, is the same, and the motive incomparably greater. They are six millions now, they would be but six millions then: their clergy would hardly be more eager to convert, nor their laity more able to rebel.

But though they might not be able, in opposition to the whole body of Protestants, to make their own religion the religion of the state; they might still, it is perhaps supposed, in concert with the sectarians, and with those other Protestants who are hostile to a church establishment, bring about the downfall of the existing church, and make all religions equal in the eye of the law.

This is to suppose, that, persons of all persuasions being included, a decided majority of the population of the two islands either is, or is likely to become, hostile to the continuance of the present church establishment. For, under any other supposition, it is difficult to see what danger there could be in throwing an additional weight into a scale, which would continue, notwithstanding, to be the lighter. Now, if this be true; without giving any opinion on the question, how far good government, good order, or religion itself, would suffer, if all religions were made equal in the eye of the law; we may be permitted to doubt whether the minority should be allowed to establish their religion, against the will of the majority; and whether the few might not, with as much justice, tax the many to build palaces for them as churches, and to pay their physicians and their lawyers as their clergy. But we do not wish to argue the question on a ground which would provoke so much opposition.

If the church were to be subverted, it would be in one of two ways: by means of the legislature, or in opposition to it; that is, by rebellion. If, then, after emancipation, it would be in the power of the Catholics, aided or not by the dissenters, to effect, in either of these two ways, the subversion of the church; what hinders them from doing it at this moment? Is it to be done by physical force? But if they are not strong enough now, emancipation would not make them so. Is it to be done by commanding a majority in Parliament? A few Catholic peers would take their seats in the Upper House; but in the Lower, beyond those whom they command at present, they would not be able to command a single vote. There would not be one Catholic elector—the Catholic aristocracy would not possess one borough—more than at present. They would indeed be enabled to return Catholics to Parliament; and, if nobody could be found but Catholics to assail the church, the disabilities would be some security: but it would be affectation in the most zealous churchman to pretend to doubt that the number of Protestants who are hostile to the church, is at least sufficient to fill the few seats which are at the disposal of the Catholic party. How happens it then that the church is not destroyed? The question is absurd. With almost every liberal Protestant on their side, the Catholics cannot command votes enough to carry their own emancipation; and it is supposed that with the great body of the Protestants against them they could command enough to overthrow the Protestant church!—But their influence in Parliament may increase. The Catholic electors may grow more numerous; more Catholics may become borough proprietors.—They may: and so they may, while their disabilities continue, and to the full as easily.

For the above reasons, and many others which we have not room to mention, we dismiss the idea of danger from Catholic emancipation. On the other hand, we are inclined to abate much from the current estimate of its advantages. An importance has been attached to it, both in respect of good and of evil, for which we are at a loss to find any adequate ground. We do not think that of itself it would do much for Ireland; the evils by which that country is afflicted, are not to be so summarily cured: and though Catholic emancipation might be a useful preparative to other and more important ameliorations, we do not think that it is by any means a necessary one.

Catholic emancipation would do nothing for the body of the people. Eligibility to office would be to them but a nominal privilege: excluded in fact by their situation in life, it is scarcely an additional evil to be excluded in law too. If they really feel as strongly on the subject of emancipation, as the friends of that measure wish it to be believed,—a belief which we find it difficult to entertain,—they must expect much more from it than the removal of disabilities; they must expect something which cannot be realized: to them, therefore, the effect of emancipation would be disappointment; and disappointment is seldom followed by tranquillity.

It is idle to expect tranquillity in Ireland so long as its inhabitants are the poorest and the most oppressed people in Europe. That they are the poorest, appears from the testimony of all who know them: that they are the most oppressed, no unprejudiced person can doubt, who will read the evidence taken before the Committees of the two Houses in the sessions of 1824 and 1825. He will there find, that whatever the end of government in Ireland may be, it at any rate is not the protection of the weak against the strong: that government and law exist in that country solely for the benefit of the strong: that, while the Negro slave is at least protected against the encroachments of all masters except his own, the Irish peasant is at the mercy, not only of a whole series of landlords, from the proprietor of the soil down to the lowest middlemen, but moreover of the tithe-owner and the tithe-farmer or proctor, to say nothing of vestries and grand juries: that against undue demands on the part of all these persons he has no remedy: that there is no law, no administration of justice for him; the superior courts being at all times inaccessible to him, and those of the country magistrates who do not take bribes, being for the most part leagued together to deny him redress; which is in general the less difficult, as the defects of the law are such, that he who would oppress under color of the law must be exceedingly unskilful if he cannot accomplish his object without incurring the penalties of the law.

All these causes of misery, and of that discontent which does, and, we hope, ever will, accompany all remediable evils, are perfectly independent of the Catholic disabilities, and would in no respect be affected by their removal. And why should we deem it impossible to apply remedies to these evils, leaving the Catholic disabilities as they are? That "purer" administration of justice," which even the bishop of Chester * admits to be necessary, would of itself suffice, and without it nothing will suffice, to tranquillize Ireland. It is not the power of the Protestant over the Catholic, which has made Ireland what she is: it is the power of the rich over the poor.

A superficial observer might perhaps infer, from the active demonstrations of hostility between the two sects, that it is the Catholics who are oppressed as Catholics, not the poor as poor, and that the body of the people, if they were not oppressed as Catholics, would not be oppressed at all. But if, in removing the Catholic disabilities, the power of landlords over tenants, of the tithe-owner over the tithe-payer, and of magistrates over the great body of the people, were left untouched, we cannot perceive that the condition of the Irish peasantry would be in any respect altered for the better. There is no evidence that a Catholic landlord treats his tenants better than a Protestant landlord. Catholic emancipation would not affect the mode of collecting tithe; and the few Catholic magistrates that there are, have now an interest in protecting the poor against their brother magistrates, which, in the event of emancipation, it is possible they might not retain.

That the Protestant aristocracy, who are now in possession of a monopoly of political power and of its attendant profit, should be averse to sharing that power and profit with the Catholic aristocracy, is quite natural. It is quite natural also that the Catholic aristocracy should feel uneasy under this forced exclusion; and as the aristocracy are much better able to make their complaints heard, than the people are, it is also natural that their grievances should be more thought of, than those of the people; but we are not therefore to suppose them of more importance.

There still remains another question to be answered, before we proceed with our comment upon the debates. If the Catholic disabilities be not in reality the grand evil of Ireland, how happens it that, in the two Houses of Parliament, they are so often spoken of as if they were?

Questions of this sort are what, in the sequel of this work, we shall very frequently have occasion to put.

In reviewing the proceedings of Parliament, it may in general be remarked, that the great abuses almost always escape its notice. The composition of the Parliament affords a key to this, as it does to so many of its other peculiarities.

The truth is, that there is scarcely an individual in either House whose interest it is that the great abuses should be reformed. The members of both Houses belong, almost all of them, to those classes for the benefit of which all great abuses exist; and not being accountable to, nor in any other way under the influence of, that much larger class, who suffer by the abuses, they have abundant motives to uphold, and no sufficient motive to redress them.

This interest being common to both parties in the two Houses of Parliament, the great abuses are, in Parliamentary discussions, by a sort of tacit consent kept out of view. The Opposition party, however, must have something to attack; or they could shew no ground for finding fault with the party in power. Nothing, therefore, remains for them to do, except to fall might and main upon the small s-buses, and do every thing in their power to cause them to be taken for great ones.

To apply these principles to the case now in hand. Here is a country, the most miserable, and at the same time the most turbulent, of all countries pretending to civilization; and that, under a set of institutions, which all—that is, all who derive either money or power from them—unite in designating as the best institutions that wisdom ever devised for the government of mankind. Here then is an anomaly to be explained; a cause must be found for it, and that too without imputing blame to these admirable institutions. The Catholic Question, appearing well adapted to the purpose, is eagerly laid hold of by the Whigs, and a part of the Tories, and exalted into a sovereign remedy for the ills of Ireland. It answers the purposes of the Whigs, by affording a handle for attacking the ministry, who, having such a panacea in their hands, neglect to apply it. It serves the purposes of both sections of the Tories, by diverting the public attention, from much more important grievances. All parties being thus interested in making as much noise about this question as possible, it is not wonderful that so much noise has been made.

The subject which chiefly engaged the attention of Parliament, on the day of its meeting, and for some time afterwards, was the Catholic Association. We need not inform our readers what this Association was: it may, however, be of some use to put them in mind of its objects. It held meetings—and it raised money. At the meetings, certain persons, mostly Catholics, and of the higher ranks, were in the habit of expressing, in strong language, their dissatisfaction at the existing state of things in Ireland, chiefly as it regarded the Catholic disabilities. To what purposes the money was applied, has never been fully made known: the offer of the Association to produce their books not having been accepted by Parliament. Part of it, however, is known to have been laid out in defraying the law expenses of such persons as had been, or were supposed to have been, injured, and were too poor to seek redress for themselves. The Association, moreover, put forth at least one address to their Catholic countrymen, earnestly exhorting them to remain peaceable and obedient to the laws.

Bodies of men very seldom act wisely: and it was little to be expected that a body of Irishmen should form an exception to the rule.

All men love power: most men love it better than any other thing, human or divine. There are times when, by joining in sufficient numbers, and acting in a body, men are enabled to exercise very considerable power. In this power, every man among them is eager to participate, by giving himself up heart and soul to the prosecution of the common design. The only part, however, of their joint operations which displays power, is the acting part; and this, accordingly, is the only part in which every man is eager to take a share. But to wise conduct, thinking is necessary, as well as acting. Thinking, however, is trouble: to the mass of mankind it is the most insupportable of all kinds of trouble: and trouble being pain, and pain being a thing which every body avoids as much as he can, we find that, as a general rule, a man will never do any thing requiring trouble, which he thinks he can, without too great a sacrifice, prevail upon another person to do for him. While every individual, therefore, is eager to act, the business of thinking for the whole body generally falls into the hands of a few: and these few will naturally be those who are known to the greatest numbers; the noisiest talkers, who, even when they have no private interest of their own to serve, are very seldom the best thinkers. As, moreover, people are naturally guided, other things being the same, by those who profess the greatest zeal to serve them; and as one very obvious mode of shewing zeal in a man's service, is to rail vehemently against those whom he considers to be his enemies; the leaders will, in addition to their other attributes, be in general among the most intemperate of the set.

These considerations would have prepared us to expect much intemperance of language in the speeches of the Association, and no very great measure of wisdom in their acts. The most foolish of their acts, however, as far as they are known (and let it be remembered by whose fault they are not all known) were not of a nature to do much harm to any body except to themselves. Considering the number of persons interested in bringing whatever was exceptionable either in their purposes or in their measures to right, it is astonishing how little has appeared but what was allowable, if not laudable. The purpose of tranquillizing the Irish people was undoubtedly a laudable purpose; the purpose of exciting attention to their own claims, cannot well be said to be a blameable one. The purpose of giving the poor man access to that justice which the expensiveness of the law has put out of the reach of every man who does not come with a full purse in his hand,—this surely was among the most laudable of all purposes. And suppose that occasionally a party in the wrong were by their assistance enabled to come into court, and be told publicly, by judge and jury, that he was in the wrong—for that was the only privilege which their assistance conferred upon him—was this a thing to be complained of? There would be little use in a public trial, if no one were to have the benefit of it until it had first been ascertained that the right was on his side. Until malá fide suitors shall wear their characters stamped in large letters upon their foreheads, a public investigation is, and ought to be, the privilege of every one, whether an honest man or a knave.

Such, however, as they were, these proceedings of the Association gave great alarm to the Protestant aristocracy of Ireland. The few, in every country, are remarkable for being easily alarmed; more especially when any one takes upon himself to censure their acts. So easily are they frightened at censure, that they never seem to feel secure until they imagine that they have put a stop to it entirely; and whenever they have been able, they have treated such censure as a crime which could never be punished too severely. It is no wonder, therefore, that they should have taken alarm at the Catholic Association. They did take alarm at it a year before. Even then, as Mr. Canning said, the ministers were “goaded” to put it down*; and, as the Association went on, the alarm increased, and ministers were “goaded” more and more, till at last they were goaded into compliance. That which a large portion of their parliamentary supporters really and earnestly demand, the ministers, if they would continue ministers, cannot long persist in refusing.

At the opening of Parliament, it was stated from the throne, that there existed associations in Ireland, which had “adopted proceedings irreconcilable with the spirit of the constitution,” and were “calculated, by exciting alarm and exasperating animosities, to endanger the peace of society, and to retard the course of national improvement.”

What is called a King’s speech enjoys a prescriptive right to be unmeaning, and we are not disposed to find fault with it for being so in the present instance. We cannot refrain, however, from representing to the framers of the speech, that a sic volo sic jubeo would have been more decent than the mere pretence of a reason. Such vague phrases as “irreconcilable with the spirit of the constitution,” “endanger the peace of society,” and the like, deserve no better name. They are not reasons; they are mere expressions of dislike. When a cause affords no better reason, there is little to be said for it: when it does, these phrases are useless, and can serve at best no higher purpose than that of swelling a period.

If the King’s speech afforded few reasons, and those few of little worth, the subsequent speeches made ample amends, in quantity of reasons, if not in quality. We will lay before our readers the whole catalogue. We imagine that the more rational and sober among the Anti-Catholics will view it with as little complacency as we ourselves.

It was alleged, then, of the Catholic Association, 1st, that its tendency was to overthrow the constitution; 2nd, that the language of some of its members was inflammatory; 3d, that it imposed taxes, issued proclamations, made laws, and in fact, exercised all the powers of government; 4th, that its business was to evade and nullify the laws; 5th, that it was a convention; 6th, that it was an imperium in imperio; 7th, that it frustrated the effect of beneficial measures of government; 8th, that it diverted the attention of the people from honest industry; 9th, that its subscriptions were collected by Catholic priests; 10th, that it retarded emancipation; 11th, that it adjured the Catholics “by the hatred they bore to Orangemen”; 12th, that it was a second Parliament, and used parliamentary forms; 13th, that it employed coercion in levying the Catholic rent; 14th, that it prevented capital from flowing into Ire-

SESSION OF 1825;—6 GEO. IV.

IRELAND.

The ADDRESS—Catholic Association —Catholic Claims—Elective Franchise—Provision for Catholic Clergy—Church Establishment, &c.

It is now our duty, conformably with the plan of this work, to pass judgment upon that portion of the proceedings of Parliament, a report of which is contained under the general head of Ireland.

These proceedings divide themselves into two parts; the one consisting of acts, the other of discussions: the one comprising what was done, by one or other House, as a body; the other, what was said, by individual members.

In our examination of what was done, it will be necessary to state our own opinions on the great public questions which occupied the attention of Parliament; to assign the grounds of those opinions, without which neither our opinions, nor those of any one, are worth regarding; and, lastly, to examine how far what was done, did or did not accord with what, in our estimation, ought to have been done.

In our examination of what was said, it will be our duty to scrutinize rigidly the arguments advanced on both sides of every question; to expose the shifts and pretences of a bad cause, and rid a good one of those bad arguments by which its real merits are often so materially obscured.

When a ground shall thus have been laid for passing a deliberate judgment upon the conduct, both of the legislature as a whole, and of every member of it individually; something more will be necessary, to give to this part of our work all the utility of which it is susceptible.

Though many proceedings in Parliament are very important in their effects, few of them are so important in their effects, as they are in their causes. When an event, in addition to whatever good or evil may result immediately from itself, gives indication of the existence of a cause, from which an indefinite number of events of like tendency may be expected to flow; an estimate of its importance would be very imperfect, in which this indication should not be included.

The actions of public, like those of private, men, are governed by their interests. Their interests result directly from the institutions under which they live: if these be good, public men have no interest that is not in unison with the interest of the community: under bad institutions, their interest is frequently different from, and even opposite to, that of the community. Accordingly, the working of good or bad institutions may always be traced in the conduct of public men. If the institutions be good, their conduct is directed towards the advantage of the community, which in that case is also their own. If the institutions be bad, they pursue either their individual interest, or that of the class, or party, to which they belong; and the interest of the community is sacrificed.

In our comments, therefore, upon the proceedings in Parliament, we shall endeavour, in each instance, to bring to view, not only the events themselves, but their causes; viz.—the interests, generated by political institutions, and variously modified by those numerous and diversified circumstances which compose what is termed the spirit of the age.

In all these points of view, few events will demand a greater share of our atten-

land; 15th, that it pandered to the prejudices and passions of the multitude; 16th, that it interfered with the administration of justice; 17th, that even in cautioning the people to be quiet, it libelled the law; 18th, that its members, in their speeches, made attacks on private character; 19th, that it named those who should and should not be returned as members of Parliament; 20th, that it had not its freedom of speech from the crown, nor could the crown suspend it; 21st, that if it had power to quell disturbances, it had power to raise them; 22nd, that it could sit whenever it pleased; 23rd, that if it continued, it would demand the Church property; 24th, that it was the machinery of a rebellion, for the time when an occasion might arrive.

Of these twenty-four reasons, we abandon twenty-one to the justice and mercy of the reader. The remaining three we reserve in our own hands: viz. the inflammatory speeches; the levying of the rent, and the interference of the Association in the administration of justice.

By inflammatory language is, of course, meant, language calculated to excite hostility. Now whether hostility, and the language of hostility, be blameable or not, depends upon the occasion, and the manner. Both the occasion and the manner were in this case very peculiar.

Here is a country of which it has been said by a Lord Chancellor—Lord Redesdale—who will not be suspected of aspiring to that character which another Lord Chancellor says, he has lived too long to have much respect for, the character of a reformer*:—Here is a country, we say, in which a Lord Chancellor says, that there is one law for the rich, and another for the poor. Here is a people, who, having but the smallest pittance beyond what is barely sufficient to sustain life, are compelled to give up nearly the whole of that pittance to build churches and pay clergymen for about one-fourteenth part of their numbers: in return for which, that fourteenth part take every opportunity of expressing their hatred and contempt for those who furnish them with money for these purposes, and their firm determination to extort as much more money from them, for other purposes of all sorts, as they can. Now then comes the Catholic Association, and, addressing itself to the thirteen-fourteenths, tells them that all this misery and degradation is not the work of nature, but of men; powerful men, who produce it for their own advantage, who for their own advantage will continue it as long as they have power, and who therefore, as a first step to effecting any improvement, must be deprived of power. This may be called exasperating animosities; in a certain sense, it is exasperating animosities: to tell the many in what way the few have treated them, certainly has no tendency to make them love the few: and if the Catholic Association are to be tried by this standard, their cause, we fear, must be given up: as must also that of all other reformers, ancient or modern. If it be always a crime to excite animosities, it must be always a crime to expose abuses. If the exposure is to be deferred until it can be made in such language as will excite sentiments of affection and good-will towards the authors of the abuses, it would be as reasonable, and more honest, to say, that it is not to be made at all.

The language of the weaker party is ever inflammatory; that of the stronger, never: because it is the stronger who is the judge. A man may rail as much as he pleases at the party which is undermost, and the language which he makes use of will not be very nicely scanned: he may inflame the passions of the powerful; he may incite those to tyrannize, who have it in their power to tyrannize; and "every thing is as it should be." But let him address himself to the weak; let him attempt to stir them up, not to tyrannize, for that is not in their power, but to use their efforts to take from the strong their power of tyrannizing—and the state is going to wreck: sedition, insurrection are abroad: and one would imagine that heaven and earth were coming together.

It is a mockery to tell a man that he is wronged, and to bid him at the same time feel no hostility against those who have wronged him. The proper exhortation is, not to let his feelings of hostility overcome his reason, and drive him to acts of useless and wicked violence: not to wreak his vengeance upon the hay-stacks and barns of those who have acted so ill a part towards him, nor to set fire to their houses, and burn them and their families alive; but to direct all his energies to one great object, the ridding them of their mischievous power. Now all this, the Catholic Association did. It not only exhorted the people to be peaceable, but many of its enemies acknowledge, that it actually made them so.

When a man has resolved to do a thing, and has it in his power, any reason will in general suffice. If the Association had not pacified the Irish, that would have been a reason for putting it down: but it did pacify the Irish: and this also was a reason for putting it down. It was discovered, that, as it had power, to quell disturbances, it probably had power to raise them: and as it was probable that it had the power, it could not but appear certain that it had the will. Upon this principle, we should be justified in throwing a man into prison, for helping a drowning person out of a river. If he had power to drag him out, he has power to push him in: so dangerous a man must not be suffered to go at large: no time must be lost in depriving him of the means of doing mischief.

It seems, however, that they had a way of pacifying the people, which made it much worse than if they had bid them go and cut throats: they adjured them to be peaceable, "by the hatred they bore to 'Orangemen':" it being deemed preferable by certain members of Parliament, that they should slaughter and burn the Orangemen, probably out of love, than live with them, out of hatred, in the peace of God and of the king. We will not now go over Dr. Lushington's argument, which instead of answering, Mr. Canning sneered at, and put to flight a whole army of syllogisms with a volley of jokes. But we do think that the Orangemen, who so rigidly act up to the Christian principle of returning good for evil, should make some allowance for the frailty of those inferior natures which fail of reaching that standard of perfection. They should bear in mind that all men cannot, like them, love their enemies, turn the left cheek to those that smite them on the right, and do good to those that hate them, and despitely use them. Pure as they are themselves from all malignant passions, Christianity does not surely enjoin so much severity, towards those who aim at no more than to make those passions subservient to virtue. We have no great objection to a species of hatred, which inspires men to obey the laws, and be good citizens and peaceable subjects.

We pass to the accusation of levying money, by improper means, from the people.

The Catholic Association was not the only association which was in the habit of levying money from the people. To say nothing of any others, the Methodist Conference is accustomed to levy money to a much greater amount, and for purposes much more strictly sectarian.* As therefore the receiving of the money could not, without too gross a violation of decency, be adduced as the heinous part of the offence; a vigorous attempt was made to get up a case which should shew that the subscriptions were obtained by coercion. It was first said, that the priests were in the habit of encouraging and collecting the rent; which not being denied, it was next insinuated, that they extorted subscriptions by refusing the sacraments to those who did not subscribe. We say insinuated, because it was only spoken of as a possibility; and upon this possibility the House was called upon to legislate. It was not shewn that the priests did as was represented, it being sufficient that they could do so, without violating their religion: this last was, indeed, denied by the Catholic prelates; but then it was affirmed by Mr. Goulburn†, and the Solicitor General‡.

Without cavilling at this logic; which, however, if nicely looked into, might probably be found to be not quite formal; we will content ourselves with asking one question. Since after all no physical coercion was used, what definition is it possible to give of moral coercion? Or how are we to distinguish that legitimate influence, by which the Rev. Mr. Wilson persuades his parishioner to give, through the fear of God, his guinea to the Bible Society, from that improper influence, that coercion (since that is the word) by which the Catholic priest persuades his parishioners to give, through a similar fear, their several pencies to the Catholic rent? We might also ask, if the peasant can be persuaded to give money, in order to purchase absolution, how it is expected, that this sort of traffic should be put a stop to by an Act of Parliament? But we have not space to follow out this question as we could wish.

Another sort of coercion, it was positively affirmed, was practised, not by the priests, but by the Association itself. This consisted in making entries in a book, which was called the black book, of the names of all those who refused to subscribe*. Without repeating the question, which we put just now, or asking how a pretence can ever be wanting to the strong man, if such a proceeding as this is to be called coercion; we will content ourselves with one fact. It was publicly stated by Mr. Brougham†, in behalf of the Association, that the names of those who refused to subscribe were not entered in any book: proof of this assertion was offered to be presented at the bar of the House; and the House would not hear it: the fact speaks for itself‡.

* See Mr. Brougham's speech, ante, p. 104.

The only remaining charge against the Association, which we intend to notice, is one to which we have already made some allusion: the charge of interference with the administration of justice. We do not know very well how to meet this charge; having some difficulty in discerning through the vague and misty language of the accusers, what sort of improper conduct it is, that was really imputed to the Association. One of them, indeed, Mr. W. Lamb, has not left his sentiments on the subject uncertain.

"There was already too much disposition," said he, "about the lower orders, even in England, to litigation. Every body knew, that if half the indictments and causes which were tried in courts were entirely omitted, it would be for the benefit of all the parties concerned in them. Then, if people would go to law, and prosecute each other needlessly, at their own expense, and even to their own ruin, where would be the end of petty ill-blood and dissension, when they were enabled to do that free of cost §!"

It having been made quite clear, by these shrewd observations, that the great fault of the judicial administration of both countries is, that justice is too accessible; that the only use of an administration of justice is to create "petty ill blood and dissension," and that it is a great crime to have been wronged; it is no wonder that Mr. Lamb should condemn the Catholic Association: who, instead of lamenting, with him, that people should apply for justice, were perverse enough to tell them that it was their due; and even gave them money to assist them in obtaining it.

Others said, that the Association, by putting forth ex parte statements, biassed the minds of the jury, and deprived those whom they prosecuted of their fair chance for justice. And this, we believe, is what the charge of "interfering with the administration of justice" amounts to. In proof of this, two instances were given, and no more, of what were considered to have been improper prosecutions by the Association. In both these instances, Mr. Brougham succeeded in rendering the impropriety of the prosecution at least a matter of doubt. But let us see what it is that is to be proved, and what it is that is given in evidence to prove it. The assertion is, that the minds of juries were prejudiced against the persons whom the Association selected for prosecution; and the proof is, two prosecutions, in both of which the prisoners were acquitted.

One word on the subject of prejudging, and ex parte statements: a subject which we thought had long ago been set at rest for ever. What notion can these gentlemen have of trial by jury, if they imagine that jurymen, who have sworn to decide according to the evidence, will suffer themselves to be biassed by the vague rumours, the extrajudicial and unsupported opinions, which they have heard out of doors? If this be a true character of an Irish jury, either an Irish jury must be a very different thing from an English one, or jury trial is altogether a very different thing from what it is supposed to be.

When it has been determined that a thing is at all events to be found fault with, it is usual, in making an account of its effects, to strike out all the good items, and leave the bad ones standing alone: to hold up to view the possible evils which may arise from it, and to say nothing of the necessarily accompanying good. When publicity was given, by the Catholic Association, to the whole story of the supposed offence, the minds of the jury, say these gentlemen, might possibly be biassed against the prisoner: well—we grant them this; let them make what they can of it. But may not this very publication raise up persons, to bear witness in his favour? Is it nothing that

† Ante, p. 120.

‡ Another assertion made by the enemies of the Association (see Lord Liverpool's speech, ante, p. 140), that a peasant had been distrained upon, for non-payment of the Catholic rent, was summarily contradicted by Lord Kingston upon the spot.

§ Ante, p. 93.

the public eye has been attracted to the case, and fixed anxiously upon the behaviour of the judge and the jury? And is it no advantage, to the prisoner himself, to know the prosecutor's case,—the assertions which he intends to make, and the evidence by which he expects to prove them? What could be of more use to the defendant in a cause, than that the counsel for the prosecution should allow him to inspect his brief? Surely then it is no injury to him, that all which is contained in that brief should be made, before the trial, a subject of public discussion.

The petition of the Catholics of Ireland for emancipation was presented to the House of Commons on the first of March by Sir Francis Burdett, who, on the same evening, moved a string of resolutions setting forth the expediency of granting the Catholic claims. The motion was introduced by what is termed a conciliatory speech; that is to say, a speech in which every body found himself praised, who had any reason for expecting that he would be blamed. "A more enlightened and liberal body of men" than the clergy of the Church of England, "did not do honour to this or any other country. The Church of England was, of all others, the faith he would rather adopt," and no wonder, if we consider the excellent reason he had for adopting it: he had been "bred up" in it, "as ample a reason as any man could be called on to give for his religion*." The Orangemen, too, were nearly perfect. "There did not exist more honourable or more liberal men." They had, to be sure, one small failing, an "unfortunate propensity to domination;" an "unwillingness to be deprived of the power they had been accustomed to exercise;" a "right which they fancied they had by birth, to trample upon their Catholic fellow-subjects†." They had no fault, in short, but a desire to get and keep, at all costs, as great a quantity of undue power as they could. We would ask, in what other habit of mind the worst acts of the worst tyrants have taken their rise? What else was it that prompted the crimes of an Augustus or an Aurungzebe? What else made an Alexander or a Napoleon the scourges of mankind?

There is no mistake which seems to be more universal among public men, not to speak of other men of all descriptions, than that of imagining it to be of no consequence what they do with their praise. In most other matters it seems to be pretty generally understood that the gift which is meant to be valued must be sparingly bestowed: but no measure, no temperance, is thought necessary in the distribution of praise; people seem in general to be ready to throw it at the first dog they meet. After what fashion men bepraise their friends, the proceedings at any public dinner will testify. At such entertainments (next to eating and drinking), the principal purpose for which the guests are assembled, seems in general to be that of receiving assurances from one another that they are patterns of every human virtue. Most men, too, are glad of any decent opportunity for bestowing laudation upon their opponents. It has so candid an appearance, and men are so naturally, and even so properly, eager to shew that they have no private hatred of those to whom they are politically hostile, that, even in bringing accusations against their opponents, which, if true, import the very essence of imbecillity and wickedness, they frequently clothe them in language expressive of the most profound veneration.

If Sir Francis Burdett,—after representing the state of things in Ireland as uniting a flagrant breach of faith with the most odious tyranny—after characterizing the Orangemen as the upholders of this state of things, and imputing to them as motives, a "propensity to domination" and a fancied right to "trample upon their Catholic fellow-subjects,"—can yet affirm, in the same breath, that "there did not exist more honourable or more liberal men" than these same Orangemen; how is it possible, henceforth, to set any value on any praise which he can bestow? We are not blaming the disposition to conciliate opponents; and we have the strongest objections to vague and general vituperation: but excessive praise, much more than which is totally unmerited, is equally mischievous, and almost equally offensive.

Bating this one fault, which, however much to be regretted, is too common not to be quite venial, and which we are far from imputing to any but the most creditable motives; the tone of Sir F. Burdett's speech was highly commendable.

In some of his reasonings we are not quite sure that we concur; in particular where he partly founds the claims of the Catholics upon the treaty of Limerick. We are favourable to those claims, because we are unfavourable, on general principles, to all religious distinctions; unless when there is strong ground for them in point of expediency, which, in the case of the British Catholics, we think that there is not: but if there were,—if it were really dangerous to admit the Catholics into a participation of political power,—we are by no means prepared to say that we should be bound to incur this danger, because certain persons, none of whom are now in existence, promised something about a hundred and thirty years ago, to certain other persons, none of whom are now in existence. Every man is bound to keep his promise—agreed: that is, he ought not to make the promise, unless he is sure that he can keep it. But that the Government of that day should be at liberty to make promises which should be binding under all circumstances upon the Government of this, or that we should be pledged to do for one set of men, whatever our ancestors promised to do for another, is a maxim of much wider extent, and we will add, of much more dubious propriety. Granting, for the sake of the argument, that the Catholics of that day, though all of them partisans of the exiled family, were wronged by the non-fulfilment of the pledge which was given to them at Limerick: nothing which can be done now, will be any reparation to them. The question at present is, what is to be done with another set of men professing the same religion, but in no other conceivable sense the same, and who, whatever claims they may have upon our justice, or our humanity, can have none upon our good faith, since our faith has never been plighted to them. The fallacy of irrevocable laws is alike absurd, in every one of its shapes.

Mr. Leslie Foster, Mr. Peel, and the Solicitor General, followed in the debate, on the side opposed to the Catholics, and set forth, at considerable length, the badness of the Catholic religion, the intolerance of Catholics in other countries, &c. &c. all which being very little to the purpose, unless it could be shewn that they would derive an increase of power for bad purposes, from the concession of their claims, the following arguments were thrown as a makeweight into the scale: 1. Grant this, and they will ask for more: (fallacy of distrust). 2. This concession to the Catholics would involve a violation of the Constitution: Was not the principle of the Protestant religion in church and state, made a fundamental and inviolable part of the compact with King William III. after the expulsion of James II.? and would they abandon that indispensable principle of the Bill of Rights? (fallacies of irrevocable laws, and vague generalities, cloaking a petitio principii). 3. The House ought not to yield to menace and intimidation†: or, in other words, having driven the Catholics to exasperation by denying them justice, they were to make that exasperation a reason for denying it to them still longer. 4. The great men, who framed the Act of Union with Scotland, introduced into that measure the principle of excluding Catholics from office§: (fallacies of irrevocable laws, and wisdom of ancestors). 5. Retaining the religion of the minority as the religion of the state, would it be safe to allow the majority to come into an equal participation with them of rights and power||?—A mere assumption, in the first place; and in the next place, it looks a little too much like the argument of the highwayman who ties your hands in order that he may more safely rob you.

Mr. Plunkett and Mr. Brougham, without grappling with the question, pointedly exposed some of the fallacies of their opponents, and addressed themselves to the House in the manner which alone has much influence with an interested audience, by appealing to their fears. In the present case, it was not possible to act upon this passion but through the medium of a fallacy. The two assumptions, upon which these gentlemen proceeded, were, that Catholic emancipation would, and that, without that measure, any thing else would not, tranquillize the Irish people¶.

¶ Mr. Brougham went so far, not long after, as to say of Catholic emancipation—"Grant that to the people of Ireland, and it would allay all dissensions and disturbances—it would give us their hearts, and in giving us their hearts, it would secure our dominion over them, so that a world in arms should not be able to wrest it from us." See ante, p. 206.

The unconscious action of those interests, to which we have before pointed as the secret springs of the conduct both of Whigs and Tories on this question, will sufficiently account for the course pursued by both these gentlemen. But to those who desire the passing of this question on its own account, and on its own account solely, we recommend a much more effectual mode of frightening its opponents into concession. Let them drag forth and hold up to view the real evils of Ireland: let them assail the abuses of the Church, the Law, and the Magistracy: and the alarmed participators in the profits of these abuses will soon consent to forego the small interest, which they have in the exclusion of Catholics from office, in hopes of disarming some portion of the opposition to those much greater evils, to which they are indebted for so much of their wealth, and their power, the power of the few over the many.

In the interval between this first debate on the Catholic question in the Commons, and its final rejection in the Lords, much of the time of both Houses was occupied by angry discussions, arising out of the petitions which were presented for and against the bill. This, which would have required no notice if it had occurred only once, having been repeated so often as to become a marked feature in the history of the Session, we will not omit those observations which appear to us to be applicable to it.

The grand object, with both parties, in these discussions, was to make it appear that public opinion was in their favour. When a petition was presented, either from the friends or the opponents, but particularly from the opponents of the bill, up started somebody on the contrary side to prove that the petition did not, followed by somebody on the same side with the petitioners, to prove that it did, represent the true state of public opinion on the question. All this solicitude about public opinion clearly shewed how nicely the two parties were balanced. When either of them is sure of a majority, right or wrong, it seldom troubles itself much about public opinion.

The meaning (if it had any meaning) of all this talk, must have been either, 1st. That, if the public were with them, they must necessarily be in the right, (vox populi, vox Dei); or, 2nd. That public opinion had declared itself so strongly, on one side, that for Parliament to take the opposite side, however right at other times, would at this time be unsafe, and therefore wrong. The first supposition (the fallacy of authority, in its least delusive shape) is too obviously absurd, to be imputed to any body: and the very fact, that there could be any dispute upon the subject, proves the falsity of the second. Those who felt sufficient interest in the question to put their names to a petition being in number no more than a minute fraction of the public, and these being nearly equally divided, things were exactly in that state in which it was quite certain that Parliament might take either course without one atom of risk from public opinion. To what end, then, all these acrimonious discussions?

If we disapprove of the end, we disapprove equally of the means; we see as much to blame in the tone and spirit which characterized the discussions, as we do in the discussions themselves.

It is a principle of human nature, as well established as any principle can be, that, taking men as they are (that is, ninety-nine out of every hundred of them), a man's opinion, as such, is of no value, on any matter in which his interest is concerned. Not only the assertion of the knave, but the unfeigned opinion of the honest man, if he be not a man of an unusually powerful mind, is sure to follow any strong interest, or fancied interest. On this principle nobody attaches any weight to the opinion of a Catholic, in favour of Catholic emancipation: and, on the same principle, no weight ought to be attached to the opinion of a clergyman of the Church of England, against that measure.

It admits of no question that the clergy of the Established Church in general apprehend great danger to the Church, from the concession of the Catholic claims. The clergy of an establishment, and dissenters from the establishment, are seldom on very good terms with one another; and the clergy, knowing that no Catholic can possibly approve of a Protestant church establishment, imagine that the establishment would go to pieces immediately if a single Catholic were admitted into power. The correctness or incorrectness of this notion, is not now in question; its existence is all that we are arguing for; and while it exists, every body must perceive that the clergy are as incompetent witnesses on Catholic emancipation, as they would be on the expediency of the Church Establishment itself.

When, therefore, petitions were presented from clergymen of the Church of England against the bill; supposing Lord King, or any other supporter of the Catholic claims, to have said any thing, what would it have been proper for him to say? Simply this:—that the petitions came from a body of men, who, as to this question, were an interested body: that if their only object were to shew that the opinions of the petitioners were unfavourable to Catholic emancipation, this was scarcely worth proving, since it was hardly to be expected that they would be favourable; but that if the object of the petitioners were to prove that the measure ought not to pass, they deserved not one particle of regard beyond what might be due to their reasons, if they gave any; and that these were no more than a repetition of what had been said and answered a hundred times in that House.

This would have been common sense, and would have had its effect, both in Parliament and out of it, without the aid of declamation or invective.—The advocates of the Bill took, however, a different course. Instead of shewing that the opinions of the clergy, on this question, were worth nothing, they did what was utterly useless as well as irrelevant, they vituperated the men. They told them, that they were intolerant, that they were illiberal, that they were deficient in Christian charity; all which language, besides that it assumed the very point at issue, namely, that the sentiments of the petitioners were wrong,—really meant nothing, except that those who used the terms were very much dissatisfied with those to whom they applied them; and moreover had all the appearance of that disposition which is itself the very essence of intolerance, a disposition to apply bad names to others for having a different opinion from ourselves.

The handle which was so injudiciously given by the one party was eagerly laid hold of by the other. They retorted the charge of intolerance upon the impugnors of the clergy; they called the clergy a prescribed body*. As the other side had begged the question against the clergy, they, not content with begging it in their favour, proceeded to something like a threat, saying, that “the petitioners belonged to a body of men whom their lordships would find out one day, as their ancestors had found before them, that they ought to treat with respect, and not with contumely †.”

The debate on the second reading of the Catholic bill opened with an exhibition of honesty and courage not often exemplified in public men. Mr. Brownlow, a leading Orangeman, abjured his old opinions, and declared himself a convert to the cause of Catholic emancipation. Such things rarely happen in the sphere of party morality, where consistency in right or wrong usurps the praise of honesty, and where the merit of having chosen and for half a century rigidly adhered to that path which is the shortest cut to honour, wealth, and power, is accepted as an equivalent for every quality which goes to make a good minister or an honest statesman‡. Where the interests of rival parties have succeeded in rendering almost infamous the highest act of virtue perhaps which a public man can perform, we hail with joy the dawn of a better morality in the public recantation of Mr. Brownlow. The manner in which that recantation was received is among the most striking marks of the improving spirit of the age.

At the same time, we must be permitted to remark, sorry as we are to say any thing which may seem indicative of a wish to tarnish the credit which Mr. Brownlow has so justly earned,—that his new opinions, upon his own shewing, have scarcely more foundation in reason than his old ones; and we should not be surprised if some of the late proceedings of the New Catholic Association were to shake his recently acquired liberality, and re-incline him to his former prejudices.

The evidence before the Committees had wrought, he said, his conversion. Dr. Doyle had declared that two doctrines, the power of the Pope to exercise temporal authority over the subjects of other sovereigns, and his power to grant dispensations for crimes, were not doctrines of the Catholic church. Dr. Doyle certainly did say so. He also said (what Mr. Brownlow did not mention) that these doctrines never had been doctrines of that church; by which latter assertion he took away the whole value of the former. If, according to Dr. Doyle, the temporal authority of the Pope is as much a doctrine of the Catholic church as it was when a Gregory or a Boniface fulminated their excommunications and sentences of deposition against kings and emperors; if the power of dispensation is as much a doctrine of the church as it was when indulgences were openly sold from one end of Europe to the other; of what consequence is it that, in the opinion of one man, or of two men (Dr. Doyle and Dr. Murray), these powers were not authorized? Their not being authorized did not prevent their being acted upon then, nor could it prevent them, if an opportunity offered, from being acted upon now. If individual opinions were wanted, we had opinions already; opinions of foreign universities, at least as high authority as Dr. Doyle. As for the Pope, we can hardly conceive any thing more ridiculous than to talk of danger from him. The real danger is from the power of the priests, whether concentrated in one man, or diffused through a great number. If they place the supreme direction in his hands, it is for their own purposes: and if they do not, it is for the same reason. His power is only their power: and does Mr. Brownlow really think that either priests or any other sort of men ever give up any power which they can possibly keep; or are withheld from resuming it by any other reason than because they cannot?

‡ Mr. Peel, ante, p. 43.—“Of the Lord Chancellor, he could not speak in terms of adequate praise; but he believed he would go down to posterity as a man of exalted merits, and as the most consistent politician who had ever held the great seal.”

We shall pass slightly over the remainder of the debate. Mr. Dawson brought forward several arguments against emancipation, the chief of which were, that Mr. O'Connell and Dr. Doyle were temperate before the committee but turbulent in Ireland: that the Catholics, in 1824, petitioned parliament for a reform in the temporalities of the Irish church, and that a Catholic parliament treated the Protestants in 1687 pretty much as Protestant parliaments have treated the Catholics ever since. Sufficient answers having been given to these objections, either by the speakers who followed, or in the former part of this article, we shall not waste our readers' time and our own by going over them again.

Mr. Goulburn and Mr. Peel again insisted upon danger to the Constitution, the Church, and the State, but without proving, any more than their predecessors had done, that whatever danger there might be would be in any wise increased by Catholic emancipation. Mr. Peel illustrated his general argument by a particular example; he put the case of a Catholic king, who, by the bill before the house, would have it in his power to appoint a Catholic ministry. The contingency is somewhat distant, as well as somewhat improbable: but suppose it certain and near at hand; unless a majority in Parliament were Catholics too, what harm could be done by a Catholic king, though backed by a Catholic ministry? If such chimerical terrors are to be listened to, what dangers are we not exposed to already! What is there to hinder the King from turning Presbyterian, and filling every office in the ministry with Presbyterians? yet is this very likely to happen? or where would be the harm if it did? Has the King, with or without a ministry of his choice, the power to change the established religion, against the will of his people? If so, he can as well change the constitution itself; whatever advantages we owe to it, exist only by his sufferance, and the government of this country is in reality despotic. But if not, what becomes of the imaginary danger?

We must now need say something (much we need not) on the celebrated speech of the Duke of York. What there was objectionable in it has been sufficiently exposed by others; and the station of the royal speaker has drawn down animadversions more severe than the speech, if delivered from other lips, would probably have called forth. As a piece of argument, it cannot be spoken of seriously; indeed it scarcely laid claim to that character. With the exception of what Mr. Canning called "the idle objection of the coronation oath*," it only offered one reason, which turned upon the oddest of all equivoques. No clergyman can sit in the House of Commons; therefore (said his Royal Highness), the Protestant church, meaning the clergy, is not represented; ergo, the Catholic church, meaning the laity, ought not to be represented either. Considered merely as a declaration of opinion, we have not much to say against this speech: his Royal Highness was as well entitled, as any other person, to choose his side. It may be questioned, however, whether it would have been in any way discreditable to his Royal Highness, if, in testifying his attachment to the opinion he had chosen, he had remembered that even the Heir to the Throne is not infallible, and that it was just possible, that the opinion, to which he was thus solemnly vowing an eternal adherence, might be wrong.

In the interval between the second and third reading of the Catholic bill, two auxiliary measures were introduced into the lower house, which have excited much discussion, and occasioned much difference of opinion, both among the supporters and among the opponents of the Catholic claims.

The question of a state provision for the Catholic clergy does not seem to us encumbered with many difficulties. Such a provision certainly is not per se desirable. To a Protestant, it must of course appear desirable that there should be none but Protestants, in which case there would be no Catholic clergy, and consequently no need of paying them.—There are, however, Catholic clergy, and they exercise great influence over the people. We should be very glad to see that influence weakened: but, in the meantime, the question is, whether every thing which can be done ought not to be done, towards rendering it as little noxious as possible.

By the admission of all who know any thing of Ireland, one of the greatest evils of that country is, a deficiency of employment compared with the numbers of the people, or, what is the same thing, an excess of numbers, compared with the means of employment. As the best established general principles forbid us to expect that any measures, having for their object to provide employment for the people, can afford any thing more than a temporary palliation to the evil, whilst their numbers continue to increase at the present rate—there is nothing to be done without correcting the prevailing habit of early marriages and heedless increase of families. But to the introduction of any change in this respect, no state of things can be more adverse than one in which the priests derive their chief emoluments from marriages, baptisms, and fune-erals*. We make no invidious insinuations; we will not ask, whether the priests have given direct encouragement to those early marriages, which have co-operated with bad government to make the Irish people what they are; but we say that nothing can be more impolitic, nor can shew a greater ignorance of human nature, than to admit of the continuance of a state of things in which it is their interest to do so.

Whenever, therefore, a public provision shall be granted to the Catholic clergy of Ireland, we hope that the act conferring it will contain a clause, providing, not for the discontinuance of the fees on marriages and baptisms, but for their being regularly handed over to some officer, for the benefit of the public revenue. To reconcile the priests themselves to this transfer, we would suggest that a portion of their stipends should be in name as well as in reality a commutation for their fees. Under this arrangement they would no longer have an interest in encouraging improvident marriages, while the money received on account of fees would in part contribute to defray the expense of the stipends.

Another reason for paying the Catholic clergy, is to diminish the interest they now have in proselytism. Believing, as * Mr. Dennis Browne says in his Evidence before the Commons' Committee, that the priests have not, at an average, in his part of the country, 100*l.* a-year, and that they get for a marriage sometimes half-a-guinea, sometimes 15*s.*, never less than half-a-guinea; independently of the collections made at the wedding among the visitors, which, according to Dr. Doyle, have been known to amount to 40*l.* The Rev. Malachi Duggan, parish priest of Moyferta and Killballyowen, who stated his annual income to be about 200*l.*, declared himself to have celebrated in the preceding year about fifty marriages; whereof about thirty produced pounds or guineas each; thirteen produced various sums from 2*l.* 10*s.* to 6*l.*; four produced various sums from 5*s.* to 10*s.*; and three, to the best of his recollection, were gratuitous. Out of an income, therefore, of 200*l.*, nearly 90*l.* were derived from the fees on marriages alone. [Rev. M. Duggan's Evidence before the Commons' Committee of 1824.]

† See, however, the evidence of Mr. Frankland Lewis, before the Lords' Committee of 1825, who says [p. 41], "I believe it is known that the priests avow that they do recommend early marriages;" and the evidence of Mr. Leslie Foster [p. 66], "I believe it is a matter pretty well ascertained, that the Roman Catholic clergy are in the habit of suggesting marriages to young persons, and not merely recommending, but enjoining them." See also the evidence of Mr. Justice Day [ibid. p. 534] to the same effect.

we do, the Catholic religion to be a bad one, we of course think it undesirable that proselytes should be made to it. The motives to proselytism will be but too strong, without the aid of pecuniary interest: but when the priest's emoluments entirely depend upon the number of his flock, those motives are at the highest pitch. Surely all Protestants should wish this to be at an end.

It deserves notice, that of all those who advocated this measure in the House of Commons, there was not one who placed the expediency of it upon the right grounds. One reason assigned was, that the Catholic clergy were a meritorious body. Another, that it was desirable they should be connected with the state; a proposition in which, if, by connexion with the state, is meant dependence upon the government, we are so far from agreeing, that if the stipends were to be put upon such a footing as to create any such dependence, it would shake our confidence in the expediency of the measure itself. Another reason was, that it was desirable that a portion of the higher classes should form a part of the Catholic clergy. We do not exactly see why; or how the higher classes could be drawn into it by changing the source of its emoluments; unless at the same time an increase were made in the amount, which would be objectionable on another score.

If the reasons given for the measure were bad, the reasons against it were still worse.

The first was, that no provision is made for the clergy of any of the dissenting sects. But there is no other sect, for the payment of whose clergy there are the same reasons.

The second was, that the Catholic clergy, if paid at all, ought to be paid out of the superfluous property of the Established Church: and if the payment could not be made in that way, it ought not, however desirable, to be made at all.

The third was, that the measure tended to undermine the Established Church. Of this tendency no proof was so much as pretended to be given. But danger to the church is that sort of thing which persons of a certain stamp are accustomed to see in every thing which they do not like.

The fourth was, that the house ought not to establish a Papal Church, armed with all the jurisdiction belonging to Papacy*. Who would not have supposed that the question before the house was whether there should be a Catholic church in Ireland, or not?

The fifth was, that it would diminish the influence of the Catholic clergy over their flocks. This objection was brought forward in the House by nobody but Mr. Goulburn; in whose mouth it seems to be any thing but appropriate: but it is the objection which we have heard oftenest urged in other places. It has not, however, being proved by any sufficient evidence, that the Catholics would like their priests the less for being no longer a burden on them; that they feel the burden most severely, is well known: that the priests' fees were a subject of complaint with the discontented, almost equally with tithes and rents, has been given in evidence by several witnesses before the Committees*. Further, if it were made out, that the influence of the priests would be diminished by a public provision, we should not consider this an evil, but a good; it appearing to us to be any thing but beneficial, either to religion or morality, that a body of priests should exercise any such influence over the people, as is exercised by the Catholic clergy; and the influence of the priests having besides afforded to the enemies of emancipation their most plausible topic of alarm.

The proposed alteration of the elective franchise in Ireland appears at first sight a measure of greater delicacy. To those, however, who look to things rather than names, there is no great difficulty in the question.

The forms of liberty, are one thing; the substance another. These two things are often confounded; and the consequence is, that the substance is very often sacrificed to the forms. There is a certain set of politicians, who maintain it as an established principle, that the substance always ought to be sacrificed to the forms; the form being in their estimation every thing, the substance nothing. It is, according to them, not only useful, but essential to good government, that the body of the people should, at every election, go to the poll, and vote for somebody; because this contributes exceedingly to the generation of public spirit: but once there, it is not of the slightest consequences whom they vote for; at least, it is not necessary that they should exercise any choice; or rather, it would be of the most fatal consequence if they did. Elections, according to them, are on the best footing, when there are but two or three real choosers; the two or three thousand, who are the nominal choosers, discharging no other functions, in regard to the favoured candidate, than that of committing to memory his name, and repeating it at the hustings, to a person stationed there to hear it.

This class of politicians find in Ireland a system of election management to their heart's content. Drove of electors, driven to the poll often without knowing, till they reach the spot, the name of the candidate whom they are to vote for; themselves the property of their landlord, a sort of live stock upon the estate, whom nobody thinks of canvassing, and who would probably stare on being told that the franchise (as it is ironically called), was regarded as a privilege to themselves. In one or two instances of late years, when the state of misery to which they were already reduced rendered ejection from their wretched tenancies an event scarcely to be dreaded, they did, in considerable numbers, break through their subjection, and from being the tools of their landlords, became the tools of their priests: in consequence of which defection they had to endure all the sufferings which the rage of their thwarted taskmasters could inflict upon them*.

It is moreover well established, though in the lamentable ignorance which prevails in this country with respect to Ireland, it seems not to be generally known, that, of those who are called, and give their votes as, forty-shilling freeholders, it is a very small proportion indeed who are really so; the remainder consisting of persons who not only have not an interest to the value of forty shillings in the land, but who pay to their landlords a full, and more than a full rent; and are registered as freeholders by the grossest perjury on their own part, and the grossest subornation or rather compulsion of perjury on that of the Irish gentlemen, their landlordst.

* See particularly the evidence of Mr. Leslie Foster before the Lords' Committee of 1825, (p. 79). "There have fallen, within my own knowledge, frequent instances of the tenants having been destroyed in consequence of their having voted with their clergy."

† See the evidence of Mr. Blake, (p. 43); of

It is true, as was justly observed by Col. Johnson, than the proper remedy for these evils is not disfranchisement, but vote by ballot. Vote by ballot, however, there was no chance of obtaining. Disfranchisement there was a chance of obtaining: it could do no harm, and might do good; by taking away from a few lords of the soil the power of bringing their thousands and tens of thousands to the poll, it would tend to give at least some more importance to the small number of electors who can choose for themselves, without drawing down upon their heads inevitable ruin. It is no mark of wisdom to reject what is good, because you cannot have what is better.

On the other hand, we agree with Lord Milton‡, that the good effects of this measure have been much exaggerated. It has been assumed, as it appears to us on scarcely any evidence, that the desire of making freeholds for electioneering purposes, has been a great cause of the minute subdivision of lands. That it may have been so in one or two instances we do not deny; indeed it is sufficiently proved that it has. But, that, as a general rule, such political influence as the landlords of the predominant party might acquire by splitting farms, over and above what they might have had without it, could act upon them with sufficient force to counterbalance the direct and obvious interest which they have in the good cultivation of their estates, is a conclusion not to be founded on one or two, or even on ten or twenty, instances. That the lands should be parcelled out in small farms, was no more than is natural in a country where, till of late, scarcely any tenants had capital enough to occupy large ones. Now, when capital is flowing into the country, the landlords are rapidly clearing their estates of the wretched cottier tenantry; uniting numbers of small farms into one, and introducing a better system of cultivation. Observe that the church lands, on which no freeholds can be created, are just as minutely divided as the rest* ; while in England, where political influence is fully as much valued as in Ireland, the land is generally let in large farms : why ? because there are farmers possessed of sufficient capital to occupy them ; and because it is in general of much more importance to a landlord that his lands should be cultivated by persons of capital and intelligence, than that he should gain a few votes, by means which are equally open to the opposite party, if they are willing to make the same sacrifices.

We, therefore, do not claim for the proposed bill, the merit of giving to Ireland a "sturdy and independent yeomanry;" we bound its pretensions to those of diminishing, in some small degree, the power of the aristocracy, and putting an end to a great amount of perjury. Though, even for these purposes, we are much inclined, with Mr. Leslie Foster and Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, to think that it did not take a range sufficiently wide, and that to produce any very sensible improvement, the disfranchisement ought to have extended to freeholders in fee, as well as to freeholders for lives.

In the debates on this question, it may be remarked, that the extremes both of Toryism and of Whiggism were found on one side, and the more moderate of both parties on the other. This anomaly appears to us to have naturally arisen out of the circumstances of the case. The thorough-goers on both sides, in their opposition to this measure, will be found to have been perfectly consistent with themselves ; while the more moderate have on this occasion made a sacrifice of party principles, from an honest desire to promote the public good.

Every Englishman who knows any thing of the manner in which the legislature of his own country is formed, knows perfectly well that the great mass of the electors, though they have somewhat more of the form, have as little of the reality of a free choice, as their degraded brethren, the forty shilling freeholders of Ireland. If all the English electors were disfranchised, who dare not vote but according to the bidding of their landlords, or customers, so few would be left that there would be no semblance of a popular choice, and the real amount of the aristocratic power would be made universally apparent. This would not suit either section of the aristocracy : neither the stronger section, who are now the absolute masters of the government, nor the weaker section, who hope to become the stronger, and by that means to become the masters of the government in their turn.

In confirmation of the above remark, so far as it affects the Whig party, it may be observed that the various plans which have been proposed by that party for putting the election of Members of Parliament upon a different footing, have been of a nature to add to the aristocratic power, not to diminish it : and to add to it, too, in the very manner to which the principle of the Irish freeholders' bill is most directly hostile, viz. by giving the franchise to a set of electors who are irresistibly under aristocratic controul. One of these plans is to take away the franchise from the electors of the rotten boroughs who do exercise a free choice, though from their small number they are interested in making a bad one, and to give an additional representation to the county electors, who are almost all of them under the absolute command of their landlords, and who are the very same class of electors whom the Irish freeholders' bill would disfranchise. Another of their plans, is to extend the elective franchise to copyholders ; who would be every where under exactly the same influence as the freeholders.

The more consistent, therefore, and clear-sighted among the Whigs, perceived that it was impossible for them to give their support to this measure, without departing from the principles on which they had constantly acted, and to which they were determined to adhere. Mr. Lambton's declaration, then, that he would oppose Catholic emancipation in order to frustrate this measure, appears to us perfectly consistent, and, on his own principles, proper.

The consistent Tories had exactly the same interest in opposing the measure, as

* See the evidence of Col. Currey, (p. 304) ; of Major-Gen. Bourke, (p. 318) ; and of Mr. Rochfort, (p. 437), before the Commons' Committee of 1825 ; the evidence of Mr. Blacker, (p. 78) ; of Justice Day, (p. 264) ; of Mr. Macarty, (p. 320) ; of Mr. Simpeon, (p. 406) ; of Mr. Lawler, (p. 442) ; and of Dr. Church, (p. 450), before the Commons' Committee of 1824. the consistent Whigs: they were also actuated by the general hostility to change; and several (Mr. Goulburn for instance) who approved of the measure, opposed it with the view of thwarting Catholic emancipation. Some persons have wondered that such men as Mr. Banks should stand forward on this occasion as the champions of popular rights; but to us it appears nothing surprising, that a man who has been all his life a determined opponent of all innovation, should oppose it on this occasion as on any other.

If we have succeeded in laying open the springs of action which impelled both classes of opponents to say and do what they said and did against the bill, the reader will be able to make the application to the different speeches without our assistance, and we should have quitted the subject had there not been one passage in the speech of Mr. Brougham, which appears to us to call for particular animadversion.

We do not allude to the bitter complaint which he made, oddly enough, of the want of information, when there is probably no subject relative to Ireland, in respect to which the information was equally complete; nor to the still odder reason that he gave for suffering the Irish freeholders to continue perjuring themselves, because officers in the army, members of parliament, and bishops, perjured themselves too; nor even to the excellent definition which he gave of the "natural influence of property," when he defined it to consist in driving Englishmen by threats to go to the poll and utter a deliberate falsehood, enforcing that falsehood by the ceremony of an oath, to put a candidate into parliament of whom they knew nothing; of which influence he added that he did not complain, and that it must exist every where*. The only part of his speech which we have it in view to touch upon, is the unprovoked attack, which he went out of his way to make, upon "the political economists."

"They were told by a class of men, who had carried their dogmatical notions almost as far, and with a spirit similar to the religious persecutions of other times—he meant the political economists, who had held up a valued friend of his, Mr. Malthus, to public ridicule, only because he differed from Mr. Ricardo on a mere metaphysical, not a practical point—that they ought to pass this measure," &c. &c. Ante, p. 193.

We cannot see in what manner a knowledge of the circumstance, that the political economists were intolerant, or had dogmatical notions, conduced to the forming a right decision on the subject of Irish freeholds; but the irrelevancy of this accusation is the least of the faults, with which it is justly chargeable.

If, by the term "political economists," Mr. Brougham intended to designate any particular individuals, we would recommend him,—before he again vituperates the cultivators of a science, the first principles of which it would do him no harm to study,—to consult Lindley Murray's English Grammar, from which he will learn the difference between nouns proper and appellative, and will be taught to avoid confounding classes with individuals. But if he include under the expression "political economists," all or most of those who have made the cultivation of that science their particular pursuit, we have not heard of any act which has emanated from these persons as a body; and we imagine that Mr. Malthus must have been somewhat surprised to find himself represented by his "valued friend" as having been "held up to public ridicule," by a class of philosophers, among whom he probably esteems himself to be not one of the least considerable. It strikes us, too, as rather odd, that the act of "holding a man up to public ridicule" should be regarded as proof of "a spirit similar to the religious persecutions of other times." Religious persecutors have been wont to resort to tortures of a keener description than public ridicule: and is Mr. Malthus the first person who has been held up to ridicule for a "merely speculative" opinion?

To be serious, it is astonishing, that a man like Mr. Brougham should either be ignorant himself, or should count upon so extraordinary a degree of ignorance on the part of his audience, as to impute intolerance to the political economists: a class of men who are by nothing more distinguished, than by the mildness and urbanity with which their warmest discussions have been carried on: a mildness till then unknown in the history of controversy; and forming a most striking contrast with the bitterness and animosity which have characterized the disputes not merely of politicians and theologians, contending for power over the bodies or souls of mankind, but even of the professors of purely abstract science, for example the mathematicians: who in their controversies with one another, or with those who have impugned any of their doctrines, have on several occasions displayed even more than ordinary arrogance, petulance, and ill-temper. He who was ignorant of all this, or knowing it could charge the political economists with dogmatism and intolerance, must have merely taken up the first bad name which occurred to him, and without for a moment considering whether it was applicable or not, flung it at the heads of those whom he had a mind to assail.

We have not left ourselves space to comment at much length upon the two remaining discussions on the Catholic question. The subject was much more thoroughly sifted in these two debates than in the foregoing: we allude particularly to the speeches of Mr. Horace Twiss and Lord Harrowby, by both of whom the only argument was put forward which really goes to the bottom of the question, namely, that, for any mischievous purpose, the Catholics would not gain one particle of power by emancipation. Mr. Charles Grant was, as usual, honest and manly. The opponents of the Catholics begged the question against them, in all the old, and a variety of new ways: but their speeches were in every material feature so like those of their predecessors, that we need not waste any words upon them. The only speech deserving of notice on that side of the question was the speech of the Bishop of Chester: and this not so much from the merits or demerits of its arguments as from the lengths to which the right reverend prelate was hurried by the clerical esprit de corps, and the cavalier manner in which he treated all classes in Ireland, except the priesthood of the church, "a priest-hood," (including, we suppose, the Honorable and Venerable Archdeacon Trench, and the Rev. Mr. Morrett of Skibbereen*) "which in the moral desolation of Ireland, remained the Oasis of the desert, "and gave to the eye some points on which "it could rest with pleasure†." It was ludicrous enough too, to hear a man who is pocketing thousands a year by his opinions, and who has nothing to fear from a strict adherence to them but removal from a lower grade of emolument and grandeur to a higher, spout mock-heroics, and talk of martyrdom.

Hitherto what we have been mainly considering, in the different speeches, has been their arguments. The occasion now calls for another sort of remark.

In private life, no maxim, that has human conduct for its subject, is more universally assented to than the paramount importance of an inviolable adherence to truth. To charge a man with a disregard to truth is justly considered as the most flagrant insult which can be put upon him: and the state of mind which characterizes an habitual liar, as one with which no good or great quality can easily coexist.

It has however been long ago observed by Addison, that party lies are in a great measure exempt from this stigma; and that men who would sooner die than be guilty of the slightest violation of truth for their individual advantage, are ready, for the benefit of their party, to put forth assertions which they not only know to be false, but which they know cannot, in the common course of things, be believed by any body for more than a few days.

Whether matters have altered in this respect, since the days of Addison, is what we do not pretend to determine. Thus much, however, will, it is believed, be found to be borne out by a considerable body of modern experience: that what would be a falsehood anywhere else, is a justifiable piece of rhetorical artifice in the House of Commons; and that gentlemen, in all other respects of the most unblemished honour, and quite incapable of saying or doing any thing which is generally regarded as dishonorable, are in the daily habit of making assertions in Parliament, which would infallibly lead an indifferent auditor to suppose that the convenience of an assertion for their purposes was a circumstance much more regarded by them than its truth.

It will be for the reader to judge, whether the assertions which we are now about to quote, belong to the class of assertions which we have just mentioned, or not. We will deal fairly by him and them; we will lay before him,—together with the assertions,—if not the proofs, at least an indication of the proofs, which lead us without hesitation to pronounce them unfounded. It is possible that the gentlemen to whom they are ascribed, may have been misrepresented by the reporters; if so, they are bound in justice to the public and to themselves, to disavow them. It is also, in the case of some of these gentlemen, just possible, that they may not have known positively that the assertions were unfounded, but only, not known them to be true. We shall be extremely glad to find that the gentlemen have been misrepresented. We bear them no ill will; on the contrary, we have for some of them individually great respect. In the code of party ethics, the stain may not be a very black one; but we confess it is one from which we would gladly see them freed.

Mr. Doherty: "Frequent allusions 'had been made to the partial administration of justice in Ireland. Now he would say, and the experience of some years entitled him to say it, that the Catholics of Ireland enjoyed the fullest and fairest administration of justice. He affirmed, without fear of contradiction from any Irish member, that THE COURTS OF JUSTICE WERE EQUALLY OPEN TO THE RICH AND THE POOR, without distinction of religious sentiments*."

The same gentleman: "As far as the experience of seventeen years' attendance on the Irish circuit enabled him to judge, THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN IRELAND WAS PERFECTLY PURE. He repeated that the administration of justice in Ireland was perfectly pure, that THE RIGHTS OF THE POOR MAN WERE EQUALLY RESPECTED WITH THOSE OF THE RICH, and that no distinction whatever was made between Catholic and Protestant†."

* Ante, p. 67.

† Ante, p. 127.—Contrast this with Mr. Doherty's own words to the jury in the case of Laurence v. Dempster. "This case will shew the manner in which the insurrection act has been administered in a part of this county. I rejoice that the cases of oppression which have been developed at these assizes were not earlier made public, lest the sturdy guardians of our rights and privileges, who yielded lately such a reluctant assent to this harsh, but, I believe, necessary law,

Mr. North: "Mr. Cobbett, who within the last two months had become the oracle of the Catholics, had desired them to make out a list of the cases in which justice had been denied, or in which oppression and violence had received a sanction from the law. The Catholics, however, had drawn out no such list, BECAUSE THEY COULD NOT; NO SUCH CASES OF SUCCESSFUL INJUSTICE EXISTING except in the heated imaginations of those who had fabricated them‡."

Mr. Goulburn: "It had been said that there was one law for the rich and another for the poor in Ireland. If that meant that there was a denial of justice to the poor man, HE BEGGED TO DENY THE FACT. With respect to magistrates, he would assert, and he defied contradiction, that THERE WAS NO SUCH THING AS A DISPOSITION AMONG THEM TO TAKE BRIBES for the administration of justice to the poor§."

To the above list, it is with great pain we add the following passage; which, however, is so vague and intangible that it can hardly be said to contain an assertion at all, consequently not a false assertion.

Mr. Brownlow: "The Protestant gentlemen of Ireland, in the relations of parents, landlords, and magistrates, FOLLOWED THE PRECEPTS OF THEIR RELIGION, BY STUDYING THE GOOD OF ALL COMMITTED TO THEIR CHARGE, in a manner not to be surpassed by a similar body of men in any country||."

The following assertion belongs to the same class:—

The Earl of Roden: "The situation of the peasantry of Ireland had, he conceived, been very much misrepresented. NO SET OF PEOPLE ENJOYED should have been confirmed in their opposition, from seeing the vile, selfish, and tyrannical purposes to which it has been made subservient in the hands of arrogant and oppressive magistrates; and lest they should have formed their opinions from the abuse rather than the use of this salutary law. Teach him, if he continue in the commission of the peace, that he must learn to administer the law in its true meaning, and not, as in the present case, torture it into an instrument of caprice or malevolence."

We quote from the speech of Mr. Spring Rice, ante, p. 127. See also, in the same speech, the energetic language of Chief Justice Bushe; language imputing to the Irish magistracy as a body, a degree of wickedness, beyond what any person in a lower station would have dared to lay to their charge.

We shall not attempt to do what volumes would not do effectually, to present the reader with the original of this delightful picture: but we can at least tell him what to read. If he will peruse those passages in the Evidence before the Committees to which we are about to refer him, he will form some conception of the purity of the administration of justice in Ireland (we are not speaking of the superior courts), both in other respects, and in regard to the taking of bribes; of the benefits which no set of people enjoy more amply than the peasantry of Ireland, to wit, those of the British constitution; and of the manner in which the Protestant gentlemen of Ireland follow the precepts of their religion, by studying, in the character of landlords and magistrates, and we will add, grand jurors, the good of all committed to their charge. We have inclosed our references to the most important passages within brackets. The authority of any one of these witnesses may be cavilled at; but we recommend to the reader to count them.

He will find there—it is not safe to tell him what he will find: let him read for himself.

Among the minor proceedings of the last session relative to Ireland, none are of sufficient importance to require notice, with the exception of Mr. Hume's motion concerning the Irish church, and the debate to which it gave rise.

As this was only a motion for inquiry, we are not called upon to give any opinion on the expediency of a revision of the Church Establishment of Ireland: a large subject, and one upon which we shall have other opportunities of stating our opinions, at greater length than our limits would have enabled us, on the present occasion, to afford. We shall content ourselves, then, with an examination of the grounds, on which the House resolved, that there was no need of inquiry.

The only speaker against the motion (Mr. Peel said but a few words) was Mr. Canning. His arguments were two. One was, that a revision of the Irish Church Establishment was contrary to the Union:

* Ante, p. 147.

The other consisted in calling the church revenues property, in denouncing all interference with them as spoliation, and affirming that the House might, with equal right, seize upon the lay tithes, and the property of corporations. To these arguments Mr. Canning added (what is often more effective than argument) vituperation: "he had never heard a principle so base propounded for consideration in that House*."

The first argument is defective in two ways: in the first place, because, as was remarked by Sir Francis Burdett in his pointed answer to Mr. Canning, the Act of Union is not a law of the Medes and Persians; in the next place, because, supposing it were so, the opponents of the motion failed, on their own shewing, in making it out to be a violation of the Union. It is a mockery to say, that, in merely enacting that the churches of England and Ireland should be united in one Protestant Episcopal church, to be subject to the same laws, it was ever intended to tie up the hands of the legislature from introducing any reform into either, which might render it more conducive to its object, or to the good of the state. Mr. Peel attempted to bolster up this flimsy argument, by referring to that article of the Union by which it was provided, that the Irish bishops should succeed in a certain order to seats in Parliament: this he called recognizing the number of bishops; and so it was: recognizing the actual number; recognizing it as being the actual number: but not surely as a number never to be altered, should any other number be, in the opinion of the legislature, more eligible. Is a law to be construed as giving perpetuity to every thing, the existence of which it takes for granted as a fact, and provides for the consequences of it accordingly? If there had been a provision in the Union to regulate the right of pasturage upon a common, or of cutting turf upon a bog, would it have been a consequence of that provision, that the common should never be ploughed up, the bog never drained? If a man had bound himself by a contract to give his footman a livery, would he by that contract have debarred himself from ever parting with his footman?

The other argument, which turns upon the words property and spoliation, was completely demolished in the masterly speech of Mr. Brougham, who pointed out the inherent distinctions between the revenues of the Church and private property, and the consequent inapplicability of such a term as spoliation to any measure for regulating their amount. Spoliation,—whatever be meant by spoliation, must at any rate be spoliation of somebody. The spoliation in question, if such it is to be called, would not be spoliation of the present incumbents, since it was proposed to leave their incomes untouched: it would not be spoliation of their children, or heirs, since these would not have got the incomes, and therefore cannot lose them. No man, no person, no actually existing being would be deprived by the proposed measure of any thing which he has, nor of any thing which he is entitled to expect. Of whom then would it be spoliation? Of an ideal being; a mere imaginary entity: an abstract idea: a name, a sound. It would, in one word, be spoliation of nobody.

Having no better arguments than these, it is no wonder that Mr. Canning should have had recourse to the old expedient of "stinging dirt." It is the characteristic of a bad cause to resort to such helps, as it is of a good one to have no need of them.

SCOTLAND.

Scotch Judicature Bill.

THE mode of administering justice in this country, is so far from being what it ought to be; the progress of improvement, in this department, is so slow, and impeded by so many obstacles; that it is matter of great interest and instruction to watch every alteration that may be called for and effected in any part of the empire. We consider it a duty, therefore, to point out what has been done by the Scotch Judicature act, which passed the legislature last session.

In order to make the matter intelligible to an English reader, it will be necessary briefly to describe the judicial establishment in Scotland; at least as far as regards civil matters.

The Court of Session at Edinburgh, is the supreme court of civil judicature, from which there is no appeal, except to the House of Lords. This court is composed of fifteen judges, called Lords of Session, and one of them the Lord President. It is divided into what is called the Inner House, and the Outer House.

The Inner House is divided into two courts of concurrent jurisdiction, called the First division, and the Second division, in each of which there are five judges, three of whom form a quorum.

The Outer House is composed of the five junior judges, four of whom are called Lords Ordinary, and the fifth, Lord Ordinary on the Bills. The four Lords Ordinary officiate alternately, each of them a week, in one of the courts of the Outer House, where causes are commenced before him; he then sits in another court of the Outer House to finish the causes commenced during the preceding week.

There is also a jury court composed of three judges called "The Lords Commissioners of the jury court in civil cases." This court was instituted in 1815, for the trial and ascertainment of disputed matters of fact in civil causes, remitted to it from either of the houses of the Court of Session, or from the Court of Admiralty.

In the country, the Sheriff's Court, the judicial functions of which are exercised by a sheriff depute, or his substitute, sits once a week or oftener during the greater part of the year, and has jurisdiction in all personal actions upon contract or obligation, to the greatest extent, and generally in all civil matters, which are not, by special law or custom, appropriated to other courts.

These are the chief courts for the decision of civil causes; and the following is a brief outline of the mode of proceeding.

With the exception of certain cases touching infancy, lunacy, absence from the country, the elective franchise, and the process for distributing the effects of bankrupts, the Inner House forms only a court of review or appeal, and causes are ordinarily commenced in the Sheriff's Court, or before a Lord Ordinary of the Outer House. In the Sheriff's Court they may be commenced before the sheriff depute, or his substitute: if before his substitute, an appeal lies to the sheriff depute. After final judgment in the Sheriff's Court the cause may be removed into the Court of Session, not as a matter of course, but with the assent of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, after presenting a bill to him praying such a removal, upon which bill he may have a debate by counsel, or agents, touching the propriety of removing the cause. If it be removed, the party removing gives security for costs.

When a cause is commenced before the Lord Ordinary, he grants his warrant for the citation of the defender, who must put in his defences within a certain time, after which the cause is entered for debate before the Lord Ordinary for the week, who, if no matter of fact be contested, either pronounces judgment, or takes the cause into consideration. The unsuccessful party, by a written statement called a representation (prepared and signed by counsel) may request the Lord Ordinary to re-consider his judgment. This request the Lord Ordinary may at once refuse, or require a written answer to be made. If he adheres to his first judgment, he may prohibit any further application to himself for review; but if he omit to make such prohibition, the unsuccessful party may call for a second review. If the request for a second review be refused, the case is still subject to review by the Lords of the Inner House. This review is not allowed before one representation to the Lord Ordinary, unless he dispenses with the representation, and it is only obtained by a printed petition, called a reclaiming petition, similar to a representation. The Court hears counsel, and either refuses the prayer of the petition, or requires printed answers, in which case they hear another argument of counsel, and then pronounce judgment. This judgment, like that of the Outer House, may be re-considered on a petition from the unsuccessful party; but a judgment of the Inner House, concurring with one before pronounced, is final in Scotland, and can only be reviewed in the House of Lords. At every stage of the proceedings, an interlocutory judgment is open to the same re-consideration as a final judgment, and if the former judgment be reversed, the new judgment is open to the same review as an original one.

Here then we may have seven stages of appeal for every Sheriff's Court cause: for every Court of Session cause, six, and often more. 1. From the Substitute to the Sheriff-depute. 2. From the Sheriff's Court to the Lord Ordinary. 3. From the Lord Ordinary to himself: and this consists of two stages; first, the debate to induce him to consider whether he shall re-consider; secondly, the debate upon re-consideration. 4. From the Lord Ordinary to the Inner House: in which there are two stages as before the Lord Ordinary. 5. From the Inner House to itself: in which there are likewise two stages. 6. To the British House of Lords: from which tribunal it is frequently necessary to send the cause back for the further consideration of the Court of Session; after which it sometime finds its way to the House of Lords again.

But there was another vice in the system of Scotch Judicature, if possible, tenfold more mischievous, even than this reiterated faculty of appeal. In England, expensive and inconsistent as our system of written pleadings is, at least it has the merit of ascertaining before the hearing, all the questions of law or fact on which the Court is required to decide. But in Scotland, the parties, instead of being compelled to state their whole case at once, were permitted to introduce new averments of fact and new pleas in law, at every interval, down to the last stage of the cause; so that the judgment in one stage was often apparently at variance with the judgment in another stage, and each stage might form as it were the commencement of a new suit. Mr. Ivory says, that "Much of the looseness and inaccuracy of statement at present complained of at the commencement of a cause, is to be attributed to the general laxity of the whole system of procedure, which prevails in the practice of our courts. Both parties are aware, that at almost every stage of a long litigation, the defects, whether of their previous statements in point of fact, or of their previous pleadings in point of law, may be corrected and supplied. Relying on this, there is not unfrequently in the outset an inclination on either side rather to withhold and keep in the back ground many of the facts, in the view of trying the adversary's strength, and of bringing out, as far as possible, the important points on which his pleas are to be rested. This tentative sort of process is productive, not only of great expense and delay, but has a tendency to involve the case in needless perplexity, and to create a degree of confusion difficult afterwards to be got the better of."

"From the same cause many actions are brought without either the pursuer or his advisers having formed any very distinct idea how they are to be supported; and many defences, on the other hand, are set up for no other reason than to procure delay, and because the party does not find it convenient at the moment to give that consideration to the matter in dispute which is essential towards making it for a judicial decision. The important facts are afterwards dropt in as circumstances may seem to require; former statements are at the same time retracted or explained away; and thus, while the complexion of the case varies at every turn, new questions in point of law are started, and sometimes a fresh source of litigation is opened up in the very last stage, and just when every thing seemed to have been brought to a conclusion.

"This system, which is peculiarly hurtful in a court where there are so many steps of review, is itself aggravated and re-acted upon by the very circumstance, that such a repeated process of review is competent. A party, before finally committing himself, endeavours to fish out, not only the case of his adversary, but the leaning also of the judge. Having, as he thinks, attained this, his statement of facts is attempted to be shaped so as best to chime in with the supposed views of the judge; and even then, looking prospectively to the further progress of the cause, this is done in such a way, and under so many qualifications and reserved implications, as to leave it open to put a new gloss on the matter, if that shall be found necessary, when the case ultimately comes before the Inner House.

"It is obvious that the successive judgments obtained by a course of pleading such as this, though often leading to different results, are not always in reality at variance with each other. They are truly judgments pronounced on questions distinct in themselves; and all of them may be equally sound in the legal principles on which they rest; alteration and reversal having been rendered necessary only by the new shape in which the case has been presented by the parties.

"If a system of pleading could be devised, whereby parties, before any judgment was pronounced, should be held finally concluded on the facts of the case, and on the more important legal pleas, arising out of these facts, incalculable benefit would arise, not only directly, in its immediate consequence to individual suitors, but still more, perhaps, indirectly, in its ultimate effect of securing a settled and well-defined system of law. There would no longer, as at present, be a seeming conflict in the successive interlocutors pronounced even by one and the same judge; but besides, the final sentence of that judge, when submitted to review, would much seldom be altered; and a result equally beneficial might reasonably be expected in the court of last resort. A very slight attention to the cases which occur in practice must convince every one, that it is not in the abstract principles of law, as applicable to a settled state of facts, that difference of opinion usually arises, but in the different views which suggest themselves to different minds in regard to an unsettled state of facts, as presented in the long, confused, and contradictory pleadings of parties."—"The number and extent of our written pleadings is at present a very serious evil. Were business conducted as it ought to be, they must be admitted, at the very least, to be useless; for surely if a case be once stated fully and accurately, there cannot be any necessity for reiterating the statement in one pleading after another, until the judge's table absolutely groans under the burden of the records. Yet, in point of fact, if almost any one process be taken up and examined, the written pleadings will be found, in the shape of argumentative condensations on the grounds of action, memorials, minutes, representations, petitions, informations, &c., to be nothing more from beginning to end, than an uninterrupted series of repetitions, in which, most frequently, little more is done than serving up the same identical argument under a different arrangement of its heads*.”

Seven or more stages of appeal! The parties put to the expence of printing the statement of their differences! with an almost interminable faculty of starting new causes of action and new defences, and of pursuing the new game through all the stages which had occupied the chase of the old! Mr. Cook, however, (one of the persons consulted by the Commissioners appointed by Parliament to inquire into the matter,) “most highly appreciates” this system, and considers “that every, the most minute alteration, ought to be made with the greatest possible caution.” And Mr. Chalmer, another of the persons consulted, says, “the form of proceeding long established in Scotland appears to me fully sufficient to attain the ends of justice, with dispatch and advantage to the suitor†.”

Fortunately, the legislature has come to a different conclusion; and though Parliament has not sufficient resolution or acquaintance with the subject to establish an entirely new system, they are willing as far as possible to palliate the mischiefs of the old.

The main object of the bill is to compel the parties to give in before the hearing of the cause, a complete and definite statement of the points in dispute between them, instead of allowing them as heretofore to start new facts and new pleas ad infinitum at every interval of the cause. The obvious mode of obtaining such a statement in the most trustworthy shape, and at the least expence of time and money, would be to summon both parties at once before the judge,—to allow him to extract it from them by interrogation and counter interrogation, in public, and himself to commit the whole to writing, as in the case of a prosecution for felony in England. The legislature, however, has chosen rather to follow the model of the written pleadings in our courts, which, though more likely to bring the case to a conclusion than the former system in Scotland, is still, fearfully dilatory and expensive.

The pursuer is now required in the outset of the cause, to set forth in precise terms, the ground and extent of his demand, and the defender, all the defences both dilatory and peremptory, on which he means to rely. When the Lord Ordinary is satisfied that no further disclosure of facts is necessary, he is to call on the parties to declare whether they are willing to abide by their respective statements. If they agree to do so, the record is made up: but if they do not agree, he may require them to put in a condescendence and answer, or mutual condescendences, containing a final statement. This final statement each party is to revise, and make the necessary alterations to meet the opposite averments; and of these revised pleadings, there is to be a concise note signed by counsel.—Here, is enough to occupy the lawyers many weeks, with what the judge, if the parties were called before him, could often do in half an hour.—Where facts are disputed, the Lord Ordinary may give such orders for the ascertainment of them as he thinks fit, or remit them for investigation by the jury court. The parties are then (when the facts have been ascertained) called for judgment, and upon that occasion may be further heard.

The bill reduces the number of Lords to form a court for each of the divisions of the Inner House from five to four, and increases the number of the Lords Ordinary from five to seven. In cases of difficulty, it also enables the Lords of Session to order a hearing in the presence of their whole number; instead of one division sending, as formerly, for the written opinion of the judges of the other division, upon cases of this nature.

Upon an appeal from a Lord Ordinary to a division of the Inner House, the Lord Ordinary is allowed to sit and form a constituent part of the court of appeal. This must place all the five in a very unpleasant situation, and not afford the best chance of having the first decision reversed where justice may require it.

In the Sheriff's Court, in causes not exceeding 12*l.* value, the decision of the sheriff depute is to be final; but causes beyond the value of 40*l.* may be removed for jury trial as well as appeal, which was not allowed before.

The bill then proceeds to extend the class of cases which may be submitted to the jury court, and to abolish the practice of each party furnishing the other, previously to the trial with a list of witnesses, a practice which had been found productive of more inconvenience than advantage.

Such are the principal alterations effected by the present measure, and as far as they go, they are in the main beneficial; they are also interesting, as indications, that the spirit of improvement is awake upon this most hopeless of all institutions, and that the government is ready to proceed as far as its information permits. It is lamentable, nevertheless, to think how small a portion of the evils attendant on our jurisprudence these alterations will remove, and how few persons there are in the legislature, able and willing to devote their minds to the subject. Scotland, however, in her Sheriff's Courts possesses a prodigious advantage over England. In them to a certain extent, justice is weekly brought home to the doors of the suitor. If six out of the seven stages of appeal were cut off; if but one review of the case were allowed, and that, upon a statement of facts, drawn up by the judge, and sent post free to a metropolitan court, there could be little complaint as to the delay and expense of judicial proceedings. As the subject passed off so briefly in Parliament, and as it will require a further notice in our article on County Courts, we shall not, at present, enter upon it more at length; we must, however, seize the first opportunity of developing the mode in which that main support of civilised society may be attained,—a cheap and expeditious administration of justice.

FOREIGN DEPENDENCIES.

Colonial Trade Bill.

CONCURRING, as we do, for the most part, in the truth of Mr. Huskisson's observations with respect to our colonial trade, we feel ourselves relieved from the necessity of discussing them one by one, and of examining his speech in detail. More acceptable service may be rendered by an explanation of the principles upon which his measure of last session is founded, and its probable results in practice; the more especially as little notice is taken of this important part of the inquiry in Mr. Huskisson's speech.

To investigate the probable effects of commercial measures by the help of scientific principles, is too commonly a tedious effort, and is felt by the House of Commons as a task of peculiar irksomeness; in this instance, as in so many others, the distaste for accurate reasoning exhibited by that assembly only renders it more incumbent upon us to expound those principles upon paper, which failed, from their abstruseness, to find publicity in the parliamentary debates.

The proposition, however, by which we shall begin, is by no means alarmingly recondite. What is wanted, as the end of all commercial laws, is the production of the greatest quantity of commodities at the lowest cost. Now those, who agree with Mr. Huskisson, assert that, as the greatest quantity of any single commodity is produced by dividing the labour of individual workmen, so the greatest amount of all commodities is obtained when each nation addict itself to such branches of production as its peculiar facilities may suggest.

The varieties of climate, situation, and soil, afford to every country some advantages, in the employment of industry, not possessed by others. By making use of such advantages, not only will a country contribute its greatest power in the production of wealth, but will obtain the greatest share of wealth for its own enjoyment. Suppose, for instance, the silk consumed in Great Britain to be the produce of a capital of 1,000,000*l.* If the facilities possessed by France for the raising of silk exceed our own by 25 per cent., it is clear that capital of the value of 800,000*l.* would produce the same amount of silk in France, with the British capital of 1,000,000*l.*: it follows, then (since the produce of the same amounts of capital, other things remaining the same, must exchange for one another), that Great Britain, by employing four-fifths of this capital in the production of other articles for which a demand might exist in France, and for whose production that country possessed inferior facilities to herself, would obtain the same amount of silk, and set free 20,000*l.* worth of capital, to be employed in other branches of industry. The consumers of silk would then obtain the same quantity as before, at four-fifths of the former cost, retaining the remaining fifth for the satisfaction of other wants; and that not only without injuring, but with a similar advantage to, the French producer.

The inference is both obvious and satisfactory: it is, that every nation derives the greatest benefit by the separate exercise of those facilities which art or accident have bestowed upon her.

It may, however, be objected that France might possess superior facilities of production in every article. Would that exclude the inter-national traffic? By no means. For it is not necessary to the existence of a trade between two countries, that each should possess over the other an absolute facility in the production of the commodity which it exports, but only a relative facility as compared with its power of producing the article which it imports. Thus, for instance, suppose England to be desirous of importing French silk, which she would pay for in manufactured cotton; now although both silks and cottons could be manufactured with less labour in France than in England, it does not follow that it would not be the interest of France to confine herself wholly to the manufacture of silk, and to import her cottons from England. If in France a bale of silk could be manufactured by 50 days' labour, and a bale of cotton by 60 days' labour, whilst in England a bale of cotton required 70 days' and a bale of silk 80 days', it would be advantageous to both parties that a French bale of silk should be exchanged for an English bale of cotton; because France would thus receive in exchange for a bale of silk which had cost her 50 days' labour, a bale of cotton which would have cost her 60 days', whilst England would also gain by giving a bale of cotton which had cost her 70 days', for a bale of silk which would have cost her 80 days'. Thus each party would save 10 days' labour by the exchange. It is manifest, then, that so long as different countries possess a different relative facility in the production of the various articles of consumption, commerce will continue to exist, and every nation will be able to find some commodities on which it may profitably employ its labour, with the view of exchanging them for the production of its neighbours.

But even putting the extreme case, in which England should not possess the means of producing a single commodity for which a demand existed in France; a commercial intercourse might still be carried on between them, through the intervention of a third country. Could we suppose a country so neglected by nature, and so destitute of artificial superiority, as to find itself outdone, by all the other countries of the globe, in every single branch of industry, in a degree, too, exactly proportionate to the cost of production of each, and absolutely in want of some one commodity, as, for instance, gold,—an extravagant case, indeed, but necessary for demonstrating the perfect truth of the hypothesis;—such a country would not fail to trade with its more fortunate neighbours: its commerce would be carried on through the medium of the precious metal; at any rate it would purchase gold, though at a greater comparative cost, with such commodities as were in request in the countries exporting that metal. In consequence of the abundance of its gold, the value of that metal would sink, and so afford an inlet for importation from all other countries, who would find their gain in purchasing its gold, though not its raw produce or manufactures. By successive operations of this sort, its trade would be long retained and constantly reproduced. So difficult is it even to conceive a case where national interchange shall not exist; and imagination cannot suggest an instance, in which, if left to its natural course, it can exist without reciprocal benefit to the parties between whom it is carried on.

It is clear then, that, as the interest of every country will incline it to those branches of production for which it is best qualified; so it is impossible to divert its industry from that channel by compulsory means, without diminishing the aggregate of its revenue, and impeding its prosperity. What a country is forced to consume or produce, it consumes or produces at a loss; at least to itself. But a forced production or consumption is the end, and has always been the effect, of most commercial regulations; which are accordingly useless, at best, and, for the most part, merely mischievous. The mischief, however, is not confined to the actual operation of such regulations as we speak of: when once imposed, they create a mass of artificial interests, whose existence depends on the system from which they sprang, and which are swept away, whenever a change of circumstances or the prevalence of the general interest over that of the few, gives birth to a change in the commercial system. Here, then, is a second source of evil from the forcible interference with the natural course of trade. To revert to our former supposition; if the French silks, after a long prohibition, were suddenly admitted, without restriction in respect to quantity, it is clear that British capital of the value of 1,000,000*l.* would be rendered temporarily useless, and must be transferred to other employments, before it could be rendered serviceable for the purposes of production. But a sudden transfer of a large amount of capital is attended with great and inevitable loss to the proprietors: the persons employed by it are unable at a short notice to apply their labour to other trades; they may want the requisite skill, and opportunities may not occur. This effect of the repeal of injurious systems of prohibition has been urged by many as conclusive, with regard to all attempts at abolishing them; the evil it has been said is certain, the advantage doubtful. But the objection is pushed too far: the evil contingent on a sudden abrogation of such systems is no proof that they should never be changed; it only proves the necessity of caution in effecting the alteration, a necessity not more obvious in this, than in other instances, wherever established interests are submitted to the hand of reform. The species of caution which is called for in commercial reforms relates chiefly to the time allowed for their accomplishment. We have been taught by such multiplied experience, that a gradual change is commonly meant by politicians to cloak the design of no change at all, that the phrase has justly grown into disrepute; but a gradual reform, in commerce, is, for the most part, the reform to be desired. An interval must be secured for the parties, the labourer and the capitalist: for the labourer, that he may turn his hand to a new employment; for the capitalist, that he may choose an opportunity for transferring his stock. Time, however, is all that can be demanded; every thing beyond is a boon granted to the individual, at the expense of the community.

Such, then, are the consequences of a restrictive system of trade: a system which prevents those countries, which are submitted to its influence, from enjoying the full measure of productiveness, which their separate advantages might be made to yield; which divides the community of each country into two classes, the consumer and the monopolist, each interested in the other's loss; a system, which bolsters up a bad principle with an infinitely vexatious detail of duties, drawbacks, and prohibitions, and, what is worst of all, which is established to the advantage of nobody, and the disadvantage of almost all the world. Bad as this system is, it has hitherto prevailed in almost every department of British commerce; it has eminently governed the colonial policy of our country, and in our opinion, as well as in the opinion of almost all who are competent judges, its effects on that branch of trade have corresponded with the badness of its principle. It has now, more especially with respect to the West Indies, struck root so deeply, the sinister interests it has given birth to are so firmly established, that, however obvious its bad effects may be, there is no department of our commerce, with the single exception of the corn trade, in which every proposition for reform is encountered by a more strenuous opposition.

But, however vehement the struggles of the West India interest for the preservation of their exclusive privileges; there is perhaps no instance of monopoly of less utility to those, for whose protection it is supposed to exist, or more susceptible of speedy and uninjurious alteration. We propose to shew the truth of this remark, by a rapid review of the extent and nature of the protection afforded to their principal export.

The West India interest demands, and has long enjoyed, the right of supplying the home market with their peculiar produce; to the exclusion, if necessary, of the produce of all other countries. This privilege has been secured to them by an absolute prohibition of the produce of many parts of the world, and by the imposition of higher duties on that of others, and more particularly of the East Indies, than are levied on their own. In consequence of their carrying trade being limited to British shipping, they have been further favoured with certain drawbacks on such of their produce as is re-exported from the ports of Great Britain. On West India sugar the duty is 27*s.* per cwt.; on East India 37*s.*: the duty on West India coffee is 6*d.* per lb.; on East India 9*d.\ But this is not all: on the exportation of West India refined sugar not only is the duty returned, but an actual bounty is paid, amounting to 3s. per cwt.* As these bounties are not merely nominal, since large quantities of sugar (the staple production of those colonies) are annually re-exported, exceeding one million sterling in value according to the official rate of valuation†, it will be readily perceived that the present consideration is one of paramount importance. The West India sugar re-exported for the foreign market is exposed to the competition of the East India growers, and is nevertheless disposed of to the great amount we have mentioned. Hence it appears that West India sugar, though charged with the additional expense of its transit through this country, is enabled, by a bounty of only 3s. per cwt., to compete with the produce of the East Indies. Whether this 3s. more than covers the cost of the extra transit through the ports of this country, or not, we cannot venture to determine; that question will be practically settled by the operation of Mr. Huskisson's bill, by which, under certain restrictions, a direct traffic is permitted to be carried on between our West India colonies and the continent. But the fact is amply sufficient to prove that the present inequality between the cost of growing sugar in the East and West Indies is not so greatly in favour of the former, if, indeed, it be in their favour at all, as the terror of the West India proprietors has induced them to believe. Precisely the same reasons may be urged, to shew that the dread of competition from the same quarter, in the British market, is no less unfounded; and, pushing our conclusions onward another step, we feel no difficulty in deciding, that the duties on East and West India sugar should be equalized at the present moment—a moment peculiarly auspicious, since justice may be done to the community, and, in the long run, advantage conferred on the West India proprietor, without inflicting any instant evil, which seems worthy to be taken into account. A great step might thus be made towards opening the colonial trade: by widening the field of supply, a greater tendency would arise towards the equalization of prices between the growths of all the sugar countries; and thus, beginning with the East Indies, we might end, by a succession of similar measures, by throwing open our market to the world.

It has, however, been objected that the present equality of price arises from the demand for sugar exceeding the supply, and that the increasing produce of the East Indies, will shortly enable them to undersell the West India planter. Should this objection be grounded, still we cannot recede from the opinion, that the present is eminently the favourable opportunity for opening the trade: at this time, prices are nearly balanced; the accumulation and investment of capital is a slow process; and before the increased produce of the East Indies can be brought into the market, the West India planter will have had time and opportunity for the gradual transfer of his capital, should that be necessary, to the cultivation of coffee and wheat. If this be deemed a hardship, it is one which cannot be relieved by Government, without inflicting a greater injury on the community, than would be averted from the planter. He complains of being gradually reduced to employ his capital in a less profitable species of production; but when it is considered that the higher profit is obtained from a forced overcharge on the consumer, it seems to us that the legitimate objects of commerce are obtained, and justice satisfied, if all possible facilities be afforded, whether by granting time, or otherwise, for effecting the transfer.

We may here stop to observe that, in the midst of this outcry in defence of the West India interest against the growers in the East, and the consumers at home, the interests of the inhabitants of our East India possessions are scarcely noticed. Injustice and inconsiderateness of the Government and the British people are spoken of as being solely exercised to the injury of the West India colonist. But is all the injustice on one side? Have the East Indians undergone no hardships, and are their interests of no account in the detail of our commercial policy? Have they suffered from no transfer of capital? and have they been deprived of no favourite branch of commerce? What has become of their cotton manufacture? The machinery of Great Britain has enabled her to arrive at the extraordinary result of competing with the East India manufacturer in his own market, and in his own staple production, notwithstanding the double carriage, and the extreme cheapness of Eastern labour: manufactured cottons, of the value of one million sterling, are annually exported to the spot where the raw cotton is grown, and this branch of manufacture, which was the great source of employment of the East India labourers, is now nearly destroyed: but as their interests are a subject of no concern with any class in the possession of power, their complaints were not heard, or, if heard, were utterly disregarded.—It is reserved for the influential proprietary of the West Indies to force their remonstrances upon the public; and the bare apprehension, on their part, of countering competition, attracts more attention in the legislature, than the complaints of the East India manufacturer, when his market was destroyed.

* Vide Hume's Custom Laws, p. 333.—A higher bounty is paid on some sorts of extra-refined sugar, amounting to 19s. per cwt.; but as sugar loses weight in the process of refinement, it is not easy to ascertain what part of this sum constitutes a bounty.

To return to the West India colonies. Such being the nature, and so small the real efficacy of the protection afforded to those colonies by the monopoly of the British market; it seems difficult to deny the expediency of withdrawing it altogether, within a very limited period of time. This, however, formed no part of Mr. Huskisson's measure; nor do we venture to blame an omission, which was probably not so much the effect of choice, as of necessity. The clamour excited by the proposal for equalizing the duties between the West India and Mauritius' sugars—a mere straw thrown up, to show which way the wind blew—gave sufficient indication of the species of opposition to be expected to any attempt upon the vested rights of the West Indians. It was probably deemed more prudent to begin by concessions to the colonies; a mode of operation against which no objection can be raised, as we confer the benefit without loss or danger to ourselves.

Hitherto our views have been confined to the principle (for we readily give him credit for acting on one) of Mr. Huskisson's measures;—the leading idea which has guided his past policy, and which should direct his future operations with respect to our colonial trade. We are now to consider the practical specimen of his system, exhibited in the act of last session, and its probable results.

The career of free trade with the colonies is begun by an act of concession. It is proposed (with certain exceptions) to admit a free intercourse between all our colonies and other countries, for the importation of every produce or manufacture of such countries, and the exportation of all colonial produce in return. The principle of this measure, we shall not attempt to question; it cannot be questioned by any man, who admits the theory of free trade. But the principle is clogged with a proviso "that the importation of foreign goods into the colonies shall be made subject to such moderate duties," in the West India ports, "as may be found sufficient for the fair protection of British productions of like nature."

The latter part of this proviso is so incongruous with the plan of a free intercourse, that we no longer recognize the principle on which the measure appeared to be grounded. The system seems to be built on the mongrel idea of combining protection to the home trade with the liberty of importing foreign goods into the colonies. Whether this be possible at all, or at any rate in the manner proposed, will appear from an analysis of the effect of a duty on the importation of foreign commodities.

The operation of such a duty must be, 1st, either wholly to exclude the foreign commodity; or, 2nd, to admit it, to the exclusion of the home produce; or, 3d, to admit both, on terms of equal competition.

We will begin with the last of these cases. Supposing the duty to be so accurately adjusted as exactly to balance the superior facilities possessed by the foreign trader in the production of his article, that it shall come into the market at the same price as the commodity produced at home; it may appear, at first sight, that the foreign and home trader would exactly divide the market: since it would be indifferent to the consumer from which of the two he purchased, when both sold at the same price. That, however, would not be the fact. A duty so imposed, is tantamount to an entire prohibition of the foreign article. If, under these circumstances, the foreigner should divide the market, it must be at the expense of the home trader's custom, who would, in consequence, be compelled to withdraw half his capital from the trade. This, however, would not occur; since the only reason which could induce the home trader to withdraw any portion of his capital, must be; the occurrence of a glut in the market, in consequence of which, the price of the commodity would fall below the cost of production, and the average profits of stock would no longer be obtained in that branch of trade. But this occurrence is excluded by the supposition. By the imposition of the importation duty, the total charges on the foreign trader in producing his commodity are equalized with those of the home producer. He cannot, therefore, sell at a lower price; he is prevented from glutting the market: the same motives, in short, which would alone induce the home trader to withdraw any portion of his capital from the particular employment in question, would prevent the foreigner from entering into a competition, which could only be injurious to both. Such a duty, then, though a duty in name, is in fact a prohibition. There is no difference in the result between such a duty and one conceived in the terms of the first case;—a duty, that is to say, imposed with a view to the direct exclusion of foreign produce.

We will now take the remaining case—that in which the duty on the foreign article is so diminished as to enable the foreigner to compete with the home trader, by underselling him; the only mode in which such a competition can exist. What is the consequence? The imported article will forthwith be brought into the market, and sold at a permanently diminished price; and as there cannot exist two prices for the same commodity in the same market, the home producer will be altogether excluded, and must transfer his capital to some other trade, unless he can afford to take lower profits than before. That, however, will not be in his power, unless he were previously obtaining more than the ordinary rate of profit; a circumstance which can nowhere occur for any length of time, and which assuredly has not been the case in our mercantile traffic with the West Indies. The conclusion is (and it admits but of little qualification), that with respect to the trade in manufactured produce—for we must except the produce of the soil, which is regulated by different laws—there is only a choice of alternatives; a choice between absolute freedom and absolute prohibition. Either the foreigner will undersell the home trader, or he will not: if he undersell him, it matters not how much, the home trader

To apply this principle to the present case.—Mr. Huskisson, by his proviso, must intend one of three things:—increase of revenue; protection to English manufactures; or relief to the colonies. Increase of the revenue is professedly no part of the present plan. We have shewn that protection to the British manufacturer, is, in fact, exclusion of foreign goods; and that is precisely the reverse of Mr. Huskisson's avowed intentions. The operation of this part of the measure will depend, therefore, on the amount of duties imposed on the importation of foreign goods into the West India ports. If the duties protect the British manufacturer, the measure will be nugatory; if not, it will effectually relieve the colonies to the extent of its provisions. We trust, however, that the majority of the duties will not have the effect of protecting the British manufacturer: this, being a pure matter of detail, it is not within our competency to determine; but we hope, with Mr. Huskisson, that his regulations will prove beneficial to the West India planters, and we shall not fail to ask in return, their consent to a more equal apportionment of duty on East and West India produce, for the benefit of the British nation.

We are willing to make large allowances for the difficulty of Mr. Huskisson's situation; we would not, to use the good-humoured remark of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "ride the willing horse too hard." With so many of the great interests of this country, all pressing for exemption from imaginary dangers, on his arm, we doubt not that Mr. Huskisson has a difficult game to play. To these embarrassments we readily attribute much of the apparent inconsistency of his measures: but we lament that such should be the influence of the manufacturers, or the weakness of the administration, that this measure for colonial relief, should be enervated or encumbered with the schedule of protecting duties; more especially in the face of considerations which could only be overlooked or unappreciated in the panic engendered by sinister interests.

Granting even that certain foreign goods may be justly excluded from the ports of the United Kingdom, for the protection of domestic manufactures;

these colonies form so small a portion of the market for British goods, that the admission of foreign competition there, would scarcely be perceived at home, however ruinous it might prove if extended to the kingdom at large. The injury which the British manufacturer would sustain from a removal of all restriction on the intercourse of the colonies with foreign countries, is a groundless exaggeration of panic terror, equally in defiance of principle and experience. The emancipated nations both of North and South America derive the great mass of their imports from Great Britain, where they obtain them at the cheapest rate; and so long as Great Britain shall be able to sell them her manufactures cheap—the only lasting or legitimate monopoly—so long will she continue to supply them. But the condition of the West India colonies is the same as that of the continents of America: a restriction, therefore, on the importation of foreign articles into the colonial ports, in favour of our own manufacture, is principally nominal, and a removal of it would but slightly alter the established course of trade. If the restrictions have any effect, it can only be to the detriment of the colonies; and it is not easy to put a case in which they can be made to suffer, which will not ultimately affect the mother country. In this respect we agree with Mr. Huskisson; who observed, that “he came clearly to the conclusion, that so far as the colonies themselves were concerned, their prosperity was cramped and impeded by the old system of exclusion and monopoly; and he felt himself equally warranted in his next inference, that whatever tended to increase the prosperity of the colonies, could not fail in the long run to advance, in an equal degree, the general interests of the parent state*.”

In spite, however, of this deliberate observation, when it was afterwards objected to Mr. Huskisson, that the schedule of duties appended to his measure was at variance with the principle he professed to act upon, what was his reply? We will not charge him with deliberately entertaining the opinion it conveys; but we cannot help quoting his answer, as a specimen of the parliamentary method of substituting words for ideas, where something must be said, but where the only thing that can be said to the purpose, must be kept in the back ground. In reply, then, to the objection, he observed, that “if he placed the colonies on a footing with the United Kingdom, “he saw no fair ground for complaint*.”

By this sleight of tongue, which has been called “the fallacy of false consolations,” Mr. Huskisson would persuade the colonists that the situation of Great Britain forms a maximum of felicity, which other countries cannot reasonably wish to exceed.

We shall not enter into that question here, which, indeed, we are glad to believe is now a work of supererogation†. We shall be satisfied with observing, that the situations of the colonies and Great Britain is not the same. It is true, that foreign manufactures are excluded from the ports of both by duties of the same kind; but the effect, however similar in appearance, is widely different in fact. Were the ports of this great manufacturing country thrown open to those foreign goods, in which she principally abounds, none would be imported; by her capability of underselling the foreign producer her inhabitants would still have an unlimited supply, at a price unincreased by any duty. The West India colonies, on the contrary, are destitute of manufactures. Such as they stand in need of, they import from Great Britain; or now, we suppose, in some instances, from foreign countries: but in both cases charged with duty‡.

Here then is the distinction: so far as it affects the British consumer, the duty is nugatory; in the colonies it is paid to the last penny.

But there is a further qualification of this part of Mr. Huskisson's bill, which affects us with more surprise; inasmuch as it can only be imputed to mistaken views of the subject, or to the influence of a low national jealousy, of which the existence could not have been suspected in the minds of those distinguished persons who control the finances and commerce of our country.

The first measure of the present ministers towards the emancipation of the colonial trade§ was followed by one of an opposite tendency from the American Government, sufficiently foolish in itself, but which was met on the part of Great Britain by a still stranger proceeding (considering the character of its authors)—a proceeding too, well worthy of some remark, as the principles which prompted it are still defended by Mr. Huskisson, and may be traced in the present measure.

The United States, from motives which it can answer no useful purpose to investigate, shortly after the opening of this trade, in the 3rd year of the present king, imposed an alien duty upon all British ships trading between our colonies and their ports, to remain so long as their produce should not be admitted into the colonies, as freely as that of England or Canada. The effect of this measure must be chiefly injurious to themselves; for it tends to raise the price of our colonial produce to them, without raising the price of their produce to the colonists. To ourselves or our colonies, it is a matter of comparative indifference. But what says Mr. Huskisson?

"To meet this unexpected proceeding on the part of the United States, we were driven to one of these two courses—either again to prohibit the intercourse with them altogether, or to retaliate the alien duties imposed upon British shipping, by subjecting to the like duties American ships entering the ports of our colonies. Neither of these expedients were in themselves desirable, but we preferred the latter."

Hence, therefore, it appears, that, because the United States have thought proper to fetter the importation of our colonial produce into their ports, it is our duty to clench the restriction by a similar proceeding of our own; to add an additional sanction to an injurious measure; to make what was bad before, still worse. Is the measure introduced by way of punishment? That is, certainly, a reasonable aim. The end of punishment, however, is not revenge; it is the prevention, or removal, of an evil. But if an evil can only be removed by the endurance of an equal or greater evil, the end of punishment is not attained. Yet such is the effect of our conduct, in the present instance. We complain, that the Americans will not receive the exports of our colonies, which is one evil; whereupon we deny ourselves the advantage of receiving theirs, which is another evil; to which may be added, that by stimulating animosities, and giving an air of importance to these measures of mistaken policy, by putting ourselves in a passion—we tender the removal of the original subject of complaint more difficult than ever; and this is a third evil, which when added to the other two, leaves us in just thrice as bad a condition as we were placed in by the Act of Congress.

We have dwelt upon this singular step of the British cabinet the more earnestly, since the motives that dictated it are still so fresh and active, that in the very bill which forms the subject of our examination, a proviso is inserted, which prohibits this newly emancipated trade, in the case of those countries which "having colonial possessions, shall refuse to grant the like privileges to British ships," unless the king in council shall deem it expedient to dispense with this condition. If the object of the measure be commercial, we repeat that this clause is worse than useless; if political, we regard it with aversion, as a system of injurious reprisals.

We have now to inquire what is the result of the principal provision in this much talked of measure of relief—what is the actual amount of benefit which it is likely to confer upon the colonies? The answer to this question depends, as we have before observed, upon the solution of another: Are the duties on importation in the colonial ports, so moderate, as to enable the foreign exporter to undersell the British, in the colonial market? If yes (as we incline to think), we hail the measure as a happy step in the career of free trade; if no, we accept it as an earnest of some substantive measures to come, when the removal of prejudice shall have tamed the vigour of that opposition, which has hitherto so triumphantly encountered all attempts to change the system of our colonial trade.

Those parts of Mr. Huskisson's measures, the propriety of which exclude all doubt, are the act which "extends to the Island of Mauritius, the duties and regulations which relate to the British islands in the West Indies;" the provision for bonding goods; and the abolition of the oppressive fees of late levied in the colonial ports. We touch upon the first of these measures, rather with the view of exhibiting a specimen of the opposition arrayed against the liberal projects of the minister, than for the purpose of enlarging on its merits.

The situation of the island of the Mauritius was peculiarly hard. Originally a French colony, it was only at the close of the war, that it became enrolled amongst the British dependencies: belonging therefore to no party, it was forsaken by all. Excepting its local situation, its condition resembled in most respects that of the West India islands; its produce being principally sugar, and cultivated by a slave population. In spite of the small amount of its produce, and its distance from England, the West India interests demanded, as a security against competition, the imposition of a duty of 10s. per cwt. on the sugar of the Mauritius, beyond that on plantation sugar.

This duty was felt as a peculiar grievance; for, unlike most countries in the same latitude, which may change their produce, the Mauritius is confined to the exclusive culture of sugar, in consequence of being annually subjected to hurricanes, from the ravages of which the sugar cane can alone escape. To remove this grievance, therefore, a bill had been introduced in 1824, but rejected on the ground that the Mauritius enjoyed a greater freedom of trade, than was then permitted to the West Indies. That pretence having been removed last session by the measure for opening the trade of the West India colonies, a bill was again brought in and passed, for equalizing the duties on the produce of the Mauritius and those colonies. Such, however, was the dread produced by a possibility of competition, that the advocates for the West India interest were on the alert against even this partial admission of sugar from the Eastern hemisphere.

In the course of the debate, an argument was advanced by Mr. Ellis, which affords a sample of the ease with which men suffer their opinions to follow the bent of their interests, as well of the dexterity attained by habitual practice in the art of torturing facts and language. The measure proposed was one intended for the benefit of the Mauritius' planters. But what if it could be made to appear that it was contrary to the wishes of those very persons? Such was Mr. Ellis's mode of presenting the question to the house, that, without stating that fact in terms, it would naturally be inferred from the expression. But Mr. Ellis shall speak for himself.

"He would request," he said, "his right hon. friend would have the goodness, before he brought in his bill, to lay before the house the petition of the inhabitants of the Mauritius, against placing them on the footing of a West India colony*."

* Ante, p. 292. The same observation was afterwards repeated by Mr. Bernal, ante, p. 300.

Mr. Ellis cannot mean that the inhabitants of the Mauritius were desirous of never being admitted to the privileges of the West India colonies, whatever they might at any time become: and yet it is not easy to attach any other signification to the words; for if he only mean, that the inhabitants of the Mauritius petitioned against being put on the footing on which the West India colonies stood in 1824, how does it follow that they are not desirous of being put on the same footing with those colonies, as they now stand, after the alteration effected by the present measure? Upon referring, however, to the petitions from the Mauritius from 1816 up to 1824 inclusive, we have no where been able to find any prayer against their being put on the footing of a West India colony; the direct request of all is to be put so far on the same footing, as to have the Mauritius' produce admitted on the same terms as the produce of the West India plantations. The following is a specimen of their language:—

"Une faveur que nous osons réclamer de votre A.R., est la réduction des droits supportés en Angleterre par les denrées provenant de notre sol, au même taux que payent les objets de semblable nature provenant des autres colonies de la Grande Bretagne."—(Papers relating to the Colonial Trade of Mauritius, p. 14.)

Was Mr. Ellis misled by the title of the first petition of July 24, 1816, "against being subjected to the regulations of the colonial trade?" Had he read that petition, he would have seen that its prayer was simply that the prohibition against trading with other countries, then in force in the West India colonies, should not be extended to the Mauritius.—The real question, however, is not merely, as Mr. Ellis seems to take for granted, whether the admission of Mauritius' sugar into the British market, would be prejudicial to the West India proprietor; but (omitting the consumer's interest) whether the injury sustained by the West Indies, from its admission, would be greater than that inflicted on the Mauritius, by its exclusion. Let the question be put in these terms, and we have little doubt of the result; for we are fully convinced of the truth of Sir Francis Burdett's observation, "that it can be no way advantageous to the country, that the interests of any class of men should be bolstered up by exclusive privilegest."

The abolition of the heavy fees exacted

in the colonial ports, is a measure of unmixed utility; as is also the provision for extending to certain of those ports the regulations of the warehousing system. So long as duties shall remain, that system is indispensable. So soon as the demand for any article of foreign produce rises, a rise of price immediately ensues; the prospect of high profits imparts an instant stimulus to exportation on the part of the foreign trader, which is as generally followed by a glut of more or less duration, and a rapid decline of prices in the importing market. Fluctuations of this kind are more peculiarly apt to occur in restricted markets; and the same causes which at one time produce a dearth, at another create a glut of commodities.

In such a case, should the importer arrive too late, or overstay the market, an immediate sale of his goods could only be effected at great loss. Gluts, however, are only temporary; and should he possess the means of holding over till prices take another turn, he may save himself from ruinous loss, or ultimately re-imburse himself altogether. But where a duty enters largely into the cost of his commodity, and is levied at the time of importation, an immediate sale is frequently a matter of necessity. By this privilege of warehousing his goods, that necessity is prevented, whilst the payment of the duty is secured. By permitting him to bring his goods into the market, in such portions and at such times, as may suit his convenience, paying the duty as they are taken from the warehouse, the interests of all parties are consulted. Not only is the revenue secured, and a more regular and agreeable supply afforded to the consumers; but the scope of those reverses is greatly narrowed, by which the most feasible speculations are too frequently attended, in consequence of rapid alterations in price.

The advantages of this part of the bill are so fully appreciated, that further observation is unnecessary. So much, in this respect at least, are we improved since the days of Sir Robert Walpole.

Whatever may be their efficacy, it is plain that the measures of last session afford a hope of beneficial change in our Colonial system. When, however, we speak of change, it is but natural to ask, what change we purpose to effect? The avowed object of Mr. Huskisson is a change from a system of reciprocal monopoly, to one of entire freedom of trade: an highly useful and laudable object for a British minister to profess and undertake; and still more so, to accomplish.

But is this the limit of improvement? When all this shall be effected: when the timber of the North of Europe and of Canada shall enter our ports on the same terms, and the sugars of the East and of North and South America shall compete in our markets with those of our West India possessions: when the benefit supposed to be derived from the monopoly of the colonial trade shall have been exchanged for the privilege of unrestricted commerce with all the world—what advantages will then be derived, and what evils suffered from the remnant of the colonial system?

On the side of gain, the advocates of the colonies insist chiefly upon three points: Colonies, say they, afford the means of increasing the mercantile, and thence the naval marine of England; they furnish a receptacle for our delinquent, and a refuge for our pauper population.

On the side of loss, all that need be said against them is included in one word: Expense.

The object is, to retain the benefit, and discard the evil.

With respect to the first advantage—the encouragement of shipping—that is sacrificed, when the trade is opened. It cannot, therefore, be properly considered as an item in the present account*.

With respect to the advantages derived from our colonial dependencies, as receptacles for convicts, and drains to the surplus of our population; in whatever degree they may be entitled to the name of advantages, they are chiefly, and may be exclusively, derived from our smaller and less expensive settlements. With respect to the loss, in the shape of expense, that is chiefly incurred in maintaining the larger colonies. All the gain may be derived from New Holland; all the loss is endured in Canada and the West Indies.

How then would the question stand with regard to Canada and the West Indies?

In every respect of trade or finance—in whatever concerns the advantage of this country—our relations with those colonies would resemble the intercourse between ourselves and independent countries.

* See post, Article "Navigation Laws."

The difference would only consist in our bearing a heavy part of the expenses of their government: a difference solely to our disadvantage. If our commercial intercourse with Canada were the same as with New York, why might we not as well consent to pay half the taxes of New York as to defray the charges of governing Canada?

It would take us too long to enter into a statistical account of the expenses of the colonies, although it would be useful to ascertain how much more is paid towards governing them by Great Britain, than by themselves. There is no direct account of these expenses before parliament; nor is there any method of ascertaining them, but by a laborious selection of different items from the Ordnance, Commissariat, and Naval accounts, which must be added to the papers nominally containing the account of the civil and military expenses of the colonies, but which only present a small part of the latter.

It has been computed that the Canadian provinces alone have already drained this country of between sixty and seventy millions*; and when it is considered that this sum has been deducted, year by year, from the income of the British people, forming a tax upon their profits, a check to their accumulation, and a motive for the transfer of their capital to other countries, for no gain to them, but to their loss; it will be thought strange that this system of waste should have been suffered to exist so long: although, when it is further considered, that the whole of the immense patronage, produced by this annual expenditure, is thrown into the hands of the British government, this astonishment will probably subside, and the reasons for retaining, the danger of attacking, and the difficulty of reforming a system uniting so many adverse parties, and supporting such powerful interests, will be more distinctly seen and acknowledged.

Here then is a point for attack. The liberal portion of the ministry have declared for an ultimate free trade with Canada; we say it should be ultimate emancipation. The public mind should be familiarized with this idea. We are now paying a heavy tax, in the shape of an artificial price, on the bad timber of that province, and probably half a million a year for the mischievous patronage of appointing its governors, generals, and judges. It is to our advantage to get rid of this burthen, honestly. As much caution, therefore, as may be needful—or, to be on the safe side, even more; but let the burthen be fairly removed.

The Canadians are fortunately quite competent to govern themselves, and they are far removed from the danger of hostile aggression on the part of other states. They are not in the condition of the West Indians, with half a million of slaves at their throats, and do not, therefore, stand in need of the same protection. They have no peculiar interests to be disturbed, and have no need of the same indemnities. Time, also, the great element in all plans of extensive change, is here a matter of less serious consideration. The object may be safely and usefully executed, and that without any long delay. In short, there is no instance in which the principle we have maintained in the preceding pages, is of so easy attainment as in this: had we pursued this policy towards our former American colonies, we should have spared—as we possibly may do, in the present instance—the loss of much blood and treasure, and averted the hostility which has so lately ceased to exist between ourselves and the American states. It was well said by Mr. Baring, that “It was time for government to consider, at what period of maturity they would be fairly and honourably ready to allow these colonies the benefit of a separate system; and whether it would not be wise and dignified for Great Britain to do early and liberally that, which she might be compelled to do in a few years hence, in a very different manner.”

Negro Slavery.

ALTHOUGH the question of Negro Slavery was not among the most prominent topics of discussion in the last session, we have no doubt of its becoming a leading subject in the next. The zeal and activity of the abolitionists, their ill-concealed distrust of the intentions of the government, and the alarm and anger of the colonists, keep the public mind so alive, that the first zealot, ambitious of succeeding to Mr. Wilberforce's mantle, may easily succeed in reproducing the agitation of 1823 and 1824. We shall, therefore, make no apology for introducing the subject in a more sub-

Before entering into the question, we must remind our readers of the course which it has taken since the views of the abolitionists have been directed to the emancipation of the slaves; for it is not until of late that their attention has been extended from the slave-trade, to the subject of slavery itself. In 1825, Mr. Wilberforce, having strong reasons to suspect that Negroes were surreptitiously introduced into the colonies, proposed that the slaves should be registered, in order to ascertain whether any new ones were imported or not. This measure produced violent heats amongst the planters; and, in some of the islands, fatal commotions amongst the Negroes. In Barbadoes, the slaves, who were deluded by the notion that instructions had gone out to concert measures for bettering their condition, which were resisted by the whites, rose and committed great devastations, and were not put down without the loss of more than a thousand of their lives. The question slumbered until 1822, when the House of Commons, at the suggestion of Mr. Wilberforce, addressed the Crown, requesting that precautions might be taken that the emigrants of the Cape of Good Hope should not cultivate their grants of land with slave-labour. This motion was the signal for the abolitionists to resume their efforts. Accordingly, in the next session, the tables of the two houses were covered with petitions for the extinction of slavery, some of which were couched in the most intemperate terms. The subject agitated the public to an unprecedented degree, and was brought before the House of Commons by Mr. F. Buxton, who proposed the abolition of slavery on the ground of its being opposed to Christianity and the Constitution: but his motion was superseded by the following resolutions adopted at the suggestion of Mr. Canning:—

“That it is expedient to adopt effectual and decisive measures for meliorating the condition of the slave population of His Majesty’s colonies.

“That through a determined and vigorous, but at the same time judicious and temperate, enforcement of such measures, this house looks forward to a progressive improvement in the character of the slave population, such as may prepare them for a participation in those civil rights and privileges which are enjoyed by other classes of His Majesty’s subjects.

“That this house is anxious for the accomplishment of these purposes at the earliest period that may be, consistently with the welfare of the slaves themselves, the well being of the colonies, with a fair and equitable consideration of the state of property therein.”

The administration followed up this decision, by sending the resolutions to all the colonies, with a circular letter addressed to the different governors, directing them to recommend to the colonial legislatures to take immediate measures for carrying them into effect. The strong disposition which the two Houses shewed in the course of their proceedings to interfere in the concerns of the colonies, and the not unreasonable apprehensions entertained by the planters, that insubordination might be excited amongst the Negroes by a knowledge or misrepresentation of the views of parliament, with respect to the ultimate extinction of slavery, excited very violent feelings throughout nearly all the colonies. In Jamaica, the Assembly threatened to oppose interference by force, and even to throw off the authority of the mother country. In Barbadoes, the resistance to the Assembly, though expressed in a more moderate tone, was equally decided; but the violent disposition of the inhabitants displayed itself in demolishing the meeting-house of a Methodist missionary, named Shrewsbury, who was driven from that island, and his congregation dispersed in defiance of the proclamation of the governor. In Demerara, the Court of Policy refused to take any measures; but the slaves, actuated by a vague opinion that the government had recommended the adoption of a plan for their emancipation, rose in large numbers, and were not quelled until after much blood had been shed by the hands of the military and the executioner. Another Methodist missionary, named Smith (who certainly appears to have entertained an obscure suspicion that something was in agitation amongst the slaves—a suspicion which he did not communicate), was tried before a court martial, and, in defiance of every principle of law and justice, condemned to death. The sentence was afterwards commuted by the King: but Smith died in prison, under circumstances of great cruelty, before advice of the commutation reached the colony. Elliott, another missionary,—against whom there was not a shadow of suspicion, was imprisoned for paying a visit to Smith, and afterwards abandoned his mission.

On the 18th of March, in the following lowing year (1824), the subject was again brought before parliament by ministers, who stated their intention, after what had occurred, to try their plan of improvement in one of the conquered colonies, which were governed immediately by the Crown; and for this purpose they selected Trinidad. The regulations were afterwards to be extended to Demerara, Berbice, the Cape, Mauritius, and St. Lucia, with variations adapted to the peculiarities of the Dutch and French laws. With regard to the intentions of government towards the rest of the colonies, which are administered by their own legislatures, the ministers stated that they should continue to admonish them to take the steps recommended; and if their admonition failed, they should resort to compulsion by vexatious taxation. But they declined to agitate the question of direct interference.

The regulations designed for Trinidad were as follows:—The procurator syndic of the Cabildo of the town of Port Spain, was confirmed in his ancient office of protector and guardian of the slaves; the commandants of the several quarters of the island were declared his assistants; and notice of all actions and suits against slaves was required to be given to the guardian, who was obliged to attend the trial. All markets were to be discontinued on Sunday, and the employment of slaves, between sun-set on Saturday and sun-rise on Monday, was prohibited. The whip was not to be carried as an emblem of authority; the practice of flogging females was abolished, and imprisonment or the stocks substituted; no male slave was to be punished for any offence until twenty-four hours after its commission; and not more than twenty-five lashes were to be inflicted in any instance, in one day; no second punishment to be ordered until the lacerations of the previous flogging had disappeared; and no punishment whatever to take place unless one person of free condition were present, besides the person by whom it should be performed. A ruled book was to be kept on every estate, in which the owner or manager was to record the punishments exceeding three stripes, the number of lashes inflicted, the reasons for the punishment, and the names of the persons attending it, a copy of which was to be regularly returned upon oath to the guardian of slaves, through the commandant of the quarter. To encourage marriages, it was determined, that if two slaves obtained the consent of their master or masters, and produced it to the guardian of the slaves, he should give directions that the marriage should be solemnized, according to the rite of the Church of England, or such other Christian church as should be most agreeable to the parties. Should the master of one or both of the slaves refuse his consent, the guardian, on application from one of the slaves, should summon the master or overseer before him to hear his motive; and if it appeared unreasonable, or if his conduct were arbitrary, the guardian might authorize the marriage, notwithstanding such refusal. To prevent the disunion of families, it was decided that, in the sale or transfer of married slaves, husband and wife should not be separated, but should be sold in one lot, and transferred to their new owner, with their children. The property of slaves, in land and goods, was secured to them, and they were enabled to dispose of it by bequest; they were also enabled to sue in their own names, in regard to their property, and to lay it out at interest in Savings Banks. The expense of registering manumitted slaves was to be paid out of the revenue of the island. The slave was to have a right to purchase, not only his own freedom, but that of his wife, child, sister or brother. If any difficulty should arise about the price, the chief judge was to arbitrate between the parties. The testimony of slaves was to be received, provided the slave could procure a certificate from his minister, that he understood the obligation of an oath, which was to be recorded by the guardian of slaves; but not in civil cases, where the interest of their masters was directly concerned, nor in criminal cases, affecting the life of a white.

These regulations, which embrace the same objects as were recommended in Lord Bathurst's circular to the other colonies, were embodied in an order of council, and promulgated in Trinidad, on the 24th of May, 1824; and began to be acted on, on the 24th of June. Great resistance was every where opposed to the order, and a remonstrance was addressed to the governor, Sir Ralph Woodford, to suspend it; but in vain. In Jamaica, some disturbances took place amongst the slaves after the last session of the Assembly, on which occasion twenty-four slaves underwent the punishment of death. The House of Assembly, in a report, attempted to qualify these disturbances as insurrections; but after a careful perusal of the trials of all the slaves, we can come to no such conclusion*. In July 1824, Lord Bathurst addressed a second circular to the governor of Jamaica, and the governors of the other colonies, requiring them to recommend the Trinidad order to the different legislatures, and at the same time announced that two bishops would be forthwith sent out. The Jamaica Assembly, still further exasperated, refused all amendments in their slave-code, and rejected, by a majority of thirty-four to one, a bill for the admission of slave-testimony; and public meetings were every where held in which the most violent and indecent language was indulged in against the parliament. In Barbadoes and Tobago, a shew was made of amending the slave-laws; but the new laws, in effect, contain no material improvements. There is no intelligence from the rest of the West India colonies of any subsequent change having taken place, in any respect†. Two bishops have since been sent out according to Lord Bathurst's promise, one for Jamaica, and the other for the Leeward Islands, who are to have the control of the church clergy.

In the meantime, in the session of 1824, the case of Smith the missionary was brought before parliament; but without effect. Last session, the case of Leceane and Escoffery, two free persons of colour, who were sent out of Jamaica by the governor, without trial, as aliens, on the alleged ground of their having maintained an improper correspondence with Haiti, and with conspiring to supply the slaves with arms, was also brought forward; and it was arranged that the commissioners in the West Indies should make inquiries into the business, and that a committee of the House of Commons should be appointed, next session, to make a proper investigation afterwards. The case of the missionary, Shrewsbury, was afterwards brought forward and canvassed in the House of Commons; when the House declared that a scandalous and daring violation of the law had been committed on that occasion, and that they would assist the government in securing protection and toleration in all the colonies. During the latter debate a leading abolitionist (Mr. Brougham) announced his intention of bringing in a bill, next session (in case the colonies did not change their conduct); to provide that Negro evidence should be admissible quantum valeret; to prevent the use of the whip in the case of women, and as a stimulus to labour; to attach the slaves to the soil; and to prevent the holders of property in the colonies from filling public offices there.

We have always believed, that if the enmity and intemperance, which the West Indians and the friends of the Negroes mutually exhibit towards one another, were suspended, it would be found, that the difference of their intentions is much smaller than either party conceives, at present. The design of the abolitionists is to cure the confessedly enormous evils of slavery, by emancipation; but if they be asked whether their object is to be effected immediately or by degrees, none but the most imprudent, and the least trusted among them, will pronounce for immediate enfranchisement. On the other hand, it is by no means a love of the institution of slavery which actuates the West Indians. If it could be shewn, that their estates could be cultivated after its abolition with the same advantage as at present, they would readily abandon it; as it is, in fact, attended with great danger and inconvenience. But since the evil was not created by themselves, for their particular interest, they maintain that they ought to be indemnified for all losses which could be traced to a change; and that they ought to be especially satisfied that their existence would not be endangered. The abolitionists themselves cannot deny the justice of these claims.

One of the main objects, therefore, in any plan for emancipation—after providing for the personal security of the West Indians—must be to prevent their suffering by the transmutation of slave into free-labour. If such transmutation operate slowly, we cannot see that their interests would be entitled to consideration; as they would have time to accommodate themselves to the change: but * Papers relating to the Manu-mission, &c. of Slaves, 1822-1824. No. 66. Ordered to be printed, 1 March 1825.

If it produce immediate bad effects, they may justly call for indemnity, in proportion to the suddenness with which the change shall have been wrought.

Although many strong facts have been adduced, to prove that cultivation can be carried on most profitably by free labour; it will be found, on a close scrutiny, that they are not applicable in the present state of the West Indies. It is indisputable, that—man for man—a slave working from fear, will not accomplish so much labour in the same time, as a free-man working from the expectation of gain; and, consequently, although the maintenance, wear and tear, and other cost of a slave, should amount to no more than the aggregate of a free man's wages, the work of the latter will be the cheaper; because there will be more of it. That there must be other principles in operation, is manifest from the planters uniformly persisting in employing slaves: nor will it be a sufficient answer to this objection, to state, that the planters are either obliged to do so, or lose the value of the slaves; for, in that case, the price of the latter would have permanently fallen, instead of remaining steady, or, at least, retaining its proportion with the rest of colonial capital. A distinction may be taken between the amount of wages which the labourer is willing to earn, and that which he is compelled to take by the value of labour in the market: the first being, of course, measured by the quantity which the labourer desires to have; and the latter, by that which his competition with his fellow labourers determines the capitalist to give. If the wages, which he is willing to earn, be earned with less labour than the capitalist wants, it is obvious that the labourer has the latter greatly in his power; it is equally obvious that, in such a case, the principle of competition does not come into operation. Hence it is impossible to decide whether free labour would be dearer or cheaper than that of slaves, without first knowing what quantity of wages the free Negro would be willing to earn.

It appears that the Negro slaves have about one day and a half out of the seven, in which to cultivate their provision grounds; and this allowance affords them time enough to raise, not only sufficient to eat, but to buy superfluities. Sir Ralph Woodford, the governor of Trinidad, in an official letter to the Under Secretary of State, dated August 3d, 1817, states, that "they can, if they choose, with very little trouble (in the day and a half per week), raise much beyond the wants of the utmost ambition or profligacy." The Assembly of St. Vincent's, in their address, dated September 4th, 1823, state that, by cultivating their provision grounds a day and a half in the week, the slave "may not only derive a comfortable, and it may be said, independent subsistence; but a surplus, for which he can, at all times, procure a ready sale, and be thereby enabled to purchase some of the luxuries of life, which never reach the lips of thousands of the happiest peasantry in Europe." In other places, the quantity of labour required, is even less. President Boyer declares, that the soil of St. Domingo is such, that half an hour's labour a day, will raise a week's subsistence—"un sol où l'homme, qui travaille une demi-heure par jour, obtient sa subsistance pendant une semaine." M. Malouet, formerly minister of Marine and Colonies in France, who bore a special commission from his government to examine into the character and habits of the Maroons in Dutch Guiana, states, that they found one day in the week abundantly sufficient, in the fertile and genial soil of the New World, to supply all their wants†. In Cayenne, after the enfranchisement of the slaves, by the decree of the French Convention of 16 Pluviose, An II., their wages were fixed by the Colonial government, at "deux sols par jour§;" from which we must understand that the day's maintenance of a Negro could be bought for a penny English. The plantain, which requires less labour even than the potatoe, is the principal food in Guiana; and it appears, on the authority of Baron Humboldt, that land yields 133 times more food when cultivated in plantains than if sowed with wheat; and 44 times more than with potatoes. The least favourable of these authorities shows, that a Negro needs labour, at the utmost, only one day and a half out of seven, to procure ample subsistence for the week. It would be idle to suppose that he would devote more time to labour, unless he had an immense train of additional wants to satisfy, which all parties admit do not exist at present. The main incentive to exertion, amongst the labouring class, after providing for one-self, is to support a wife and children; but the most intemperate advocates for the emancipation of the Negroes grant that they have no such motive; since the total absence of marriages amongst them, is the theme of their most violent criminations against the colonists. The climate renders the two other leading objects of labour—lodging and clothing—infinitely less necessary than in European countries. Accordingly we shall find the truth of this conclusion established by evidence in the strongest manner. All the witnesses from the British islands, whose evidence is given in the celebrated Report of the Committee of Privy Council, in 1788, concur in stating the invincible repugnance of the free Negroes to all sorts of labour. Messrs. Fuller, Long, and Chisholme, state, that the free Negroes in Jamaica were never known to work for hire; and the Committee of Council of the island, besides corroborating the assertion, add, that the free Negroes are averse to work for themselves, except when compelled by immediate necessity. Mr. Brathwaite, the agent for Barbadoes, affirms that, if the slaves in that island were offered their freedom, on condition of working for themselves, not one-tenth of them would accept it. Governor Parry avers, that the free Negroes are entirely destitute of industry; and the Council of the island add, “that their confirmed habits of idleness make them the pests of society*.” Under the administration of Toussaint l’Ouverture, laws were passed to compel the enfranchised Negroes, to work on the plantations, by military punishment†; and Dessalines and Christophe found it necessary to resort to measures of coercion, besides providing that the labourers on each plantation should have one-fourth of the gross produce‡; and yet it does not appear that these regulations produced the desired effect. In Cayenne, it was found impossible to make the enfranchised slaves labour; and the whites, in whose possession the capital remained, were accordingly ruined for want of hands$. In Guadeloupe, after the decree of 16 Pluviose, the government fixed, that the Negroes of each plantation should be rewarded for their labour, with one-third of the gross produce: but the inducement was found insufficient; and at last, Victor Hugues, the governor, was obliged to resort to the guillotine and military execution; to suppress their insubordination: but even these additional measures failed, for the planters met the same fate as those in Cayenne.

If we take the longest time indicated by these authorities, and add another day to provide for the clothes and lodging, which the Negroes would be obliged to pay for themselves, in a state of freedom, we shall have the produce of two days and a half’s exertion out of seven, as the total amount of wages which the free Negro seems willing to earn. Should the planter, therefore, require him to devote the remainder of the week to labour, for hire, the Negro would fix nearly any price he liked; and accordingly, the former must be either ruined, or his returns must be of the most extravagant description, to support such an outgoing. Few considerations are necessary to shew that the latter is impossible. The present cost of a slave’s food is the value of his labour during one day and a half, out of seven, and it may be calculated that his lodging, clothing, and cost price, amount, on an average, to about a day more; making together the price of free wages, at the rate, beyond which the desires of the free Negro do not seem, at present, to extend. If the returns of the West India planter were large enough to support the cost of free labour for the rest of the week, the profits which he now puts into his pocket from slave labour, must be enormous; but we need only recall the recollection of our readers to the state of colonial affairs, during the last twenty years, to shew that the very contrary of this has taken place; the returns, in fact, having been hardly enough to support slave labour, with a very moderate profit. There is even still stronger evidence to corroborate this conclusion:—it appears, on the authority of M. Say, “quo les manœuvriers les plus grossiers, ceux dont la capacité n’est pas supérieure à celle du Nègre esclave, se font payer, aux Antilles, leur journée, sur le

"pied de cinq, six, sept francs, et quelque-fois davantage*." Governor Mainwaring says, that the price of ordinary free labour in St. Lucia is six livres a day for men, and three for women; and for handicraftsmen nine livres †. Mr. Kilber, Commissary Judge at Havannah, under the Slave-trade regulations, states, that in Cuba, a common field Negro earns four reales de plata (half a dollar) a day, and is fed; the salary of a regular house-servant is from twenty to thirty dollars a month, besides being fed and clothed; and mechanics are paid from ten bits, or reales, to three dollars a day‡. These rates would make, at a medium, 90l. a year for wages, supposing them to work the whole week. The average cost of a good slave is about 80l., which at 10 per cent., on account of its being a life-interest, is 8l. per annum; add 20l. per annum for the value of the day and a half which he is allowed for his provision ground, and 10l. for clothing, lodging, &c. and we shall find a sum of 40l. for the annual out-going; instead of 90l. But, when we consider that it is nearly impossible to procure a freeman to work on the sugar plantations, at any price whatever, the difference will be infinitely greater.

Much fallacious, or, at best, useless reasoning might have been spared, if this important fact had attracted more attention. The planters have urged the indolence of the free blacks as an objection to manumitting the slaves, and a good deal of discussion has taken place on the question, whether the Negroes are naturally more indolent than the whites; as if all men were not indolent, when they have no adequate motives to exertion. On the other side, an argument has been drawn from the greater dearth of land in the free states of America, as compared with the price of soils possessing the same advantages in neighbouring slave states, to shew the superior cheapness of free labour. It does not appear that the fact as stated, rests upon much observation; but, even if it be true, nothing can be inferred from it affecting the case of the West Indies, unless it be shewn what proportion the cost of maintaining and buying the slaves in the slave states bears to the aggregate wages of the free cultivators. Inferences have been drawn from the superior cheapness of free labour in Russia and Poland; and from the sort of enfranchisement, which the slaves enjoy in those and other countries, from the masters finding it profitable to assign them task-work in lieu of forced labour. It has, moreover, been alleged, that the wear and tear of a free servant, though equally at the expense of the master with that of the slave, generally costs less, because it is managed by himself. It might be sufficient to reply to the latter argument, that the loss in the wear and tear of a slave is taken into the account at the time of purchase, and diminishes the purchase money, like the chance of death, or the wear and tear of a machine. But it is manifest, that these minor arguments must be unimportant, so long as there is so little approximation between the cost of buying and maintaining a slave in the West Indies, and the wages which the facilities of obtaining food, and the conveniences of the climate would enable him to exact if he were set free. It has been argued, that the increase which has taken place amongst the free blacks, by birth, shews that the Negroes have the same inclination to work diligently as the whites. We have already adduced positive evidence of the contrary; but it may be added, that an increase only proves, that they work enough to procure sufficient means of subsistence to breed on, which we know, from the example of Ireland, will suffice for that purpose, when of the most miserable and limited kind. Adam Smith even avers, that a half-starved Highland woman will breed twenty children. Sugar is raised in Bengal and other parts of the East Indies, it is alleged, at a vastly cheaper rate than in the slave islands; and in the East Indies labour is free. It does not distinctly appear, that labour is altogether free in the East Indies, and if it were, its low price is the mere result of competition; unless the institution of distinct castes of cultivators and labourers may be supposed to exert some influence. According to Mr. Colebrooke, it seems, that slaves may be found in Bengal, among the labourers in husbandry, though in most provinces, none but freemen are so employed. The price of their daily labour, when paid in money, may be fairly estimated at little more than one ana sicca, or less than two pence sterling; and when paid in grain, it does not in the average exceed 1½d., the allowance to a strong labourer being no more than one ana*. By the sugar report laid before the East India proprietors, in 1822, it appears, that according to the current rate of wages at Benares, the labourers (Coolies) employed in sugar cultivation were paid 3 piece (1½d.) per day, for holing; 2½ piece (1½d.) for manufacturing in one pergunnah, and 2 piece (1d.) in two other pergunnahs, for both processes. This it will be recollected is in Bengal, where more sugar is imported from Java and China than is exported; and consequently the wages in the latter countries must be still lower. Will a free negro of Jamaica work on a sugar estate, continuously, for twopence, or one penny a day?

The present condition of Haïti has been referred to in Parliament, to shew that the Negroes will labour when enfranchised; but a scrutiny of the few important facts of which we are in possession, connected with that island, will shew that they bear out no such conclusion. M. de Marbris states, that previously to 1788, the following quantity of sugar was annually exported from the French part of Haïti:—

French lbs.

70,227,709....Clayed Sugar,

93,117,512....Muscovadoes,

34,455,300....Molasses, besides tafia, an inferior kind of rum. General de la Croix, who refers to "Les Comptes fournis à l'Assemblée Centrale, par l'Administrateur Général de la Colonie," states, that in the year 1801, the quantity of sugar made in the same part of Haïti was only.

French lbs.

16,540....Clayed Sugar,

18,518,572....Muscovadoes,

99,419....Molasses, and no tafia. In 1822, the total export of sugar from Haïti appears, on the authority of M. Inginac, the Secretary, to have been only 652,541 lbs., which we will suppose correct, although the extraordinary discrepancy between the accounts of M. Inginac, and the official returns of imports, both into the United States and Great Britain, gives strong reason for suspecting the veracity of that minister. The decrease in the quantity of coffee exported in the year 1788 and 1822, is nearly as large†. In 1790, it was estimated that the population, including whites, amounted to about 600,000 souls: during the sanguinary revolution that followed, the civil wars to which it gave rise, and the exterminating attack made on the island by Bonaparte, it is supposed, that it was diminished by 200,000; and, accordingly, Bryan Edwards states it to be 400,000 in 1805. If we may believe the official account of M. Inginac, which supposes an unheard-of rate of increase since 1805, the population, in 1824, was 935,335. How then is this enormous decrease of the exports of those articles with such an immense concurrent increase in population to be accounted for? The destruction of the necessary capital, during the revolution, and the succeeding wars, cannot be objected as an answer; for it would still remain to be shewn, that the Negroes have the inclination to labour. Nor will it suffice to allege, that the Haïtiens labour in raising other kinds of produce; for, in the first place, it must be kept in mind, that sugar and coffee are the main products of the planters, and consequently that arguments which refer to other products are irrelevant; and, in the second place, if the argument would hold good, the fact itself is impossible; for it appears, by the statement of M. Inginac, that all the other exports amount to a very small proportion, compared with sugar and coffee. In 1822, according to that minister, the exports were

It may be objected, that the produce is consumed at home; but that can be easily shewn to be impossible. If the capital required for raising the ordinary produce of the West India islands had not been destroyed in the revolution, it is manifest, that the Haitiens could not consume all they would be able to raise; since, previously to 1788, when the labouring population was at least one-third less than it is at present, according to M. Inginac's statement, Haiti could afford to export, of sugar and molasses alone, nearly 200,000,000 lbs. after supplying her own inhabitants. If, on the contrary, the capital have been destroyed, which all accounts agree in stating to be the fact, the labour of the Haitiens must be devoted to raising other articles, or to mining or manufactures, of the existence of which there is not a tittle of evidence.

† By a proclamation of Boyer, dated March 20th, 1823, it would appear, that sugar is even imported into Haïti. "Ne voyons nous pas," he says, "tous les jours arriver dans nos ports des marchandises sortant des îles dont il est question? Ne savons nous pas que des caboteurs Haïtiens vont y charger à leur bord du sucre, du sirop, du tafia, du rhum, &c. par l'appât d'un gain illicite et les introduisent, en fraude, sur notre territoire contre le vœu de nos lois?" However, we need not place much reliance on this document, as great allowance must be made for vagueness and exaggeration.

The impossibility of any sudden alteration of slave into free labour, without either ruining the planters, or remunerating them by a heavy indemnity from this country, we therefore consider as indubitable; the loss, however, would not be confined to the mere inability of carrying on the cultivation; the plantation-capital, stock, implements, and the land itself, must also become worthless; as there would be no other kind of production in which to employ them, nor any hands to carry it on, if there were. An indemnity to the planters, such as the justice of the case would demand, must, in fact, extend to the entire value of the colonies.

Although this view of the subject is amply sufficient to shew the necessity of gradual measures, a slight consideration of the effect of immediate emancipation upon the slaves will exhibit it even more clearly. In their present situation, their spirits are broken, and their feelings debased by chastisement, and the want of the most ordinary civil institutions. If they were suddenly set free, they would become a horde of ferocious barbarians, actuated by revenge and hatred to destroy the whites, and devastate their property; or, which is much more probable, would at once sink into a listless inactivity, from which it would be impossible to extricate them. Either alternative is far too dear a price to pay. The proposal of immediate emancipation is most liable to these difficulties; but the two other plans for rapid enfranchisement are more or less exposed to them also.

By one of these it is proposed, that all the children born after a certain day shall be free, but that they shall remain with their mothers till they are old enough to labour, when they shall be bound as apprentices to the owners for a term of years, as a remuneration for their loss as slaves, and the cost of bringing them up. Now, in the first place, if the child should be disabled, or die before the apprenticeship, or its expiration, the planter's remuneration would be affected: and in the next place, the servitude, during which he must associate with the slaves, perform the same work, and be exposed to the same treatment, would unfit him for becoming free; so that at its termination, he would sink into the same barbarous inactivity, which would attend a sudden emancipation.

By the second plan, it is proposed to buy up all the females. It appears, that the female slaves, including children, amount to about 360,000; and, if 60,000 be excluded as not worth redemption, on account of their advanced age, or infirmities, 300,000, or about three-eighths of the slave population will remain to be purchased, who at 50*l.* each (which is about the average price of women slaves) would, it is supposed, cost 15,000,000*l.* But there is an important fallacy lurking in this easy calculation. If a commodity be very rare, or if there be no more of it to be obtained, the value is prodigiously enhanced, which would be the case with the female slaves, as they would be the last of their kind. But when we add to this, that the colonies would be deprived at a blow of a large mass of labour, say one-fourth, it is obvious, that the loss which would arise to the planter, from such a sudden diminution of hands, or from the vastly increased expense he would be put to, in supplying the void with free labour, would augment the cost of redemption to an amount far greater than the one supposed. Assuming, however, that this country would be willing to expend so large a sum (and it must be recollected, that it would be a naked loss, as the only means of reimbursement would be to resort to compulsory labour, which would only be making the females slaves of the government, instead of private owners) what would become of the females themselves? What reason is there for conceiving, that they would not immediately fall into that fatal inactivity, which the climate, the fruitfulness of the soil, and their want of motives for exertion, point out as the two pre-bable destiny of the freed Negroes? The promoters of this plan suppose, that they will occupy the places of wives and daughters of the men slaves: but such a speculation supposes vast changes and improvements—the attachment of the slaves to the soil—the institution of legal marriages—the inseparability of families, and a train of new wants, which would all require a length of time incompatible with the plan itself. Besides, what is to become of the unmarried and the orphans?

What then are the best means of changing the slaves into free labourers, in the way most conducive to their own interests, and the interests of the planters? We have already calculated, that two days and a half, out of seven, will supply them with food, clothes, and lodging. If the slave were married, and had children, a further day and a half might be fairly added; and if we suppose, that he would pass the Sunday unemployed, we shall have four days and a half, occupied, out of six, in providing for physical wants of the kind he feels at present. If wants could be imparted to him, which would demand a further day, it will be found, that he must devote five days out of six to toil, which is the portion of time that large classes of artisans in England expend for the same purpose. But simple as this calculation appears, it supposes the pre-establishment of vast improvements, which we shall now proceed to consider.

Ignorance is the great obstacle to the amelioration of the slaves, as of all the rest of mankind. The Government, therefore, have acted very wisely in making instruction the leading feature of their plan. But we have much doubt as to the fitness of the measures, which they have taken for carrying it into effect. The main purpose of teaching the Negroes, is, not so much to communicate knowledge, as to inculcate sobriety, industry, and other habits of civilized men, which can only be taught by the most constant and familiar communication with them on the part of their teachers. Their teachers must, therefore, be more than ordinarily insensible to the disagreeableness of popular instruction; for the character and personal habits of the Negroes will make it a work of the most revolting kind. How entirely the accomplishments of the clergy-men of the Established Church, and the education they receive at the Universities, unfit them for such a task; and how far their views of the duties of an instructor of slaves, fall short of the real standard, may be seen from the language of the new Bishop of Jamaica:—"It is difficult," he observes, speaking of the Negroes, "to make sure of their attendance; but psalms and organs have great attractions for them." What substantial benefit the slaves can derive from gaping over the liturgy and a sermon, which they are content to endure, for the sake of the psalm-singing at the end, we are at a loss to conceive. The only way of securing teachers, fit for such a work, is to take them from the lower orders, in this country, or the blacks, and people of colour. Unfortunately, the English Church cannot furnish teachers of such an origin; and the Methodists, and other inferior sects, who are in the habit of sending missions, do not possess the confidence of the colonists, without which no efficient good can be done.

With a view to give the slaves opportunities for religious instruction, the government has proposed the abolition of Sunday markets; but, we think, with too little precaution. It appears that, in most of the islands, Sunday is the only day allotted to the slaves for attending the markets, and cultivating their provision-grounds, during the season of crop, which lasts from five to six months. During the remainder of the year, they have another whole day in the week. There is no comparison, as may be easily supposed, between the value of the slave's labour at different seasons. If we look at the constancy and severity of his work during crop-time, he may be said to be comparatively unemployed at other seasons of the year, as will appear from the following account of the management of the estate of Mr. Hibbert, a large proprietor, in Jamaica, by no means remarkable for exacting an extraordinary amount of labour from his slaves:—

"During that period, the general plan is to begin the manufacture of sugar on Sunday evening, and to continue it generally, without intermission, either day or night, till about midnight of the following Saturday, when the work stops for about eighteen or twenty hours, to commence again on the Sunday evening. In order to prevent any interruption of this process during the week, the slaves, capable of labour, are with some necessary exceptions, divided into two gangs, or spells, which, besides being both fully occupied in the various occupations of the plantaion during the day, are engaged the whole of the night, or alternate nights, in the business of sugar-making. The labour, during crop-time, is thus equal to six days and three nights in the week*."

The planters very reasonably reply to this requisition of the government, that if the time for market and the cultivation of the provision-grounds were changed from Sunday to a week-day, the advantages at present derived from the labour of the slaves, would be diminished by one-fifth or sixth—a sacrifice which they cannot afford to make. What would any proprietor in this country think of a proposition by which he should be called on to surrender fifteen or twenty per cent. of the revenue of his estate, for ever? It is idle to appeal to the statutes which prohibit labour on the Sabbath in this country, to justify such an act. Those statutes have always been a dead letter in the colonies, which are not to be legislated for by the rule of our institutions, but with a view to their actual condition. The answer to the complaint is obvious enough. Let the planters be indemnified by this country, for the partial loss in the value of the slaves.

The next great improvement is the establishment of marriages amongst the slaves, which are too obviously important to need remark. One of the chief obstacles which occurs to the institution of marriages, is, when the parties belong to different owners. There can be no doubt that such marriages would be attended with loss to one, at least, of the owners, if the object of them were fulfilled; or it could not be fulfilled at all. The remedy for both mischiefs is to allow the wife to follow the husband to his owner, who should be allowed to purchase her: if he refuse to consent, the owner of the wife should have the same facility; and if both dissent, the slaves might be sold together to a third party, and the price paid rateably to the owners. Something like this provision is contained in the Spanish Cedula. Above all things, the consent of the masters to the marriage should not be required. But the main obstacle is the liability of the parties to be separated from each other, or their children, at the pleasure of the owner; for it is out of the question to suppose that marriages will take place, when the married slaves may be afterwards torn from each other and their families, at the will of third parties

Accordingly, no legalized marriages have occurred between the Negroes, in any of the West India islands. Provisions, therefore, ought to be made, not only to legalize such marriages, as recommended by Lord Bathurst, but to prevent the separation of the parties, under any circumstances; like those contained in the Spanish and Portuguese laws, which prohibit even the judicial sale of either party separately. The colonists themselves appear to confess the necessity of such provisions, as, in various of the islands, laws have been instituted for the encouragement and protection of marriages.

This leads us to consider the important plan of attaching the slaves to the soil. So long as they are exposed to be taken from their dwellings, at any moment, and transferred to other owners, and other abodes, they are deprived of some of the strongest motives to improve themselves. One of the main causes of social amelioration is the security of property. The only property that a slave can possess, is derived from the produce of his provision-ground. But what motives can he have to cultivate it beyond what is required for the moment, unless he feels secure that he shall not lose the fruit of his labours, by being sent to another plantation? Besides, the security of a settled home will obviously be one of the chief means of promoting marriages; as it will render the separation of the married couple impossible.

It must, however, be admitted, that more good has been anticipated from this measure than we can see reason to expect; for some have supposed that, by being attached to the soil, the Negroes would become free, like the villains of the feudal ages†. The capitals vested in West India cultivation, and particularly in the cultivation of sugar, must be very large, and employed simultaneously‡, which must be fatal to the metayer, or share cultivation, necessary to give the Negroes the small interest in the soil, which the villains possessed, as the first step. Such a system supposes a great paucity of capital, or a very limited call for it, on the part of the owner; and, accordingly, we find that it has been only pursued by owners of slaves in employments that require little or none of it. In Brazil, the owner supplies the slave daily with a certain quantity of provisions and tools, and the latter is obliged to return a certain quantity of jewels, or gold, according to the nature of the ground. The pearl fisheries of Panama were in the hands of Negro slaves, who were bound in the same manner, to render a certain number of pearls every week. In neither of these employments is capital necessary, beyond a very small quantity. It is true, that a great fall of profits on the present abundant capital in the West Indies, might render it necessary for the owner to resort to a cheap mode of cultivation; but it does not follow, in any shape, that he would resort to share cultivation for that purpose.

But the difficulties with respect to the views of certain reasoners on the side of the Negroes, are not confined to doubts. At present, as there is no law in any of the colonies to prohibit the owner from separating his slaves from the land, by sale or disposition at his pleasure, there can be no question that inconvenience, and even injustice might be done, if this right were taken away immediately; but we believe, that security would be provided against such consequences, if the abrogation of the right were postponed, so as to give him time to prepare for the change.

It appears that the raising of sugar and coffee has sometimes the effect of exhausting the soil, so as to render it barren: the islands are likewise exposed to hurricanes which lay waste the planters' stock and crops. In these circumstances, it would be a great injustice to the latter to prevent him from removing his slaves to a new soil, or from disposing of them, at a time when they might be the only property left him. These are, however, extreme cases, and ought not to affect the general question; besides, justice might be done, if the claim of the planter were left to the adjudication of some tribunal, competent to decide fairly between him and the slaves.

The main difficulty lies in preserving the rights of creditors. We shall not stop here to consider why mortgages are so much more common in the West Indies than elsewhere; we only need state the fact, that owing to certain circumstances, it rarely happens that a West India estate is not incumbered with mortgage-charges, generally in favour of the merchant in England, who lends on condition of receiving the consignments of the produce, in order to get the commission.

As the security of the merchant requires that he should be empowered to recover his loan without the impediments thrown in the way of mortgages in England, it is the practice for them to take judgments from the borrowers, which can be made immediately available by a writ of execution, under which, by the colonial laws, the land may be seized and sold, as well as the stock and crop. The sheriff or provost-marshal is bound to seize and sell in the following order:—first, the crops; then the goods; then the debts due to the defendant; next the plantation utensils; afterwards the slaves, and lastly the land; resorting only to the two last in case of deficiency in all the rest. As the worth of the crops (which are the only effects of much value) depends upon the season of the year, it happens, of course, that the sheriff or provost must have recourse to the slaves, who are sold in this way much more commonly than is generally supposed. The only mode of preventing the mischief is, to provide that the land shall be sold with the slaves, which would of course amply secure them from being detached from it. Lord Bathurst, in his circular, appears to have fallen into an error as to the requisition of the abolitionists on this head, as he supposes that it extends to prevent the sale of slaves for payment of debts in all cases; but it is obvious that this would have the very effect which is to be guarded against, since if the slaves could not be sold at all, the land would be seized and sold away from them. In cases where the mortgage deed is charged by the parties on the slaves alone, and not on the land, things must be left to their course; but as they are of rare occurrence, the mischief would be comparatively small. Injustice, it is true, would be done, in the cases of existing debts, if such an alteration in the law were effected immediately; but, if time were given for the purpose, it is clear that none whatever would arise. For there are but two ways in which a law affecting existing debts can operate; viz. the debtor either owes no more than his crop and slaves would satisfy, or his debt is so large that the writ must take the land. In the latter event, it is obvious that the proposed change could affect neither party. In the former, the order in which the sheriff or provost is obliged to sell, makes the slaves the real security, after the crop; the land, though bound by the judgment, being unavailable. Now any mischief that could befall the debtor would be either from the creditor's accelerating or retarding the execution. If it were hastened, he would do no more than he is empowered to do under the existing law; and if he retarded it for the purpose of making the land available, the debtor would have the opportunity, in the meantime, of making arrangements by borrowing from a new lender, or by saving from the estate. If the debtor could do neither, the land would be sold as well as the slaves, because he would have no other resource than the sale of his estate, when deprived of the means of working it. It is impossible to say that such a provision would be productive of no hardship whatever, because there may be particular cases out of the common rule; but they cannot be numerous, and consequently ought not to stand in the way of a great improvement. The alteration might be made immediately with respect to future debts, without any injustice whatever.

But of all the projected improvements, a change in the system of punishing the slaves, is that which is attended with the greatest difficulties. It has been doubted whether flogging be actually applied to the slaves at work; but the paper of remarks by a committee of Trinidad planters upon Lord Bathurst's circular, which appeared in the Trinidad Gazette of August 1824, sets all doubts at rest, as it declares that "by those who have most considered the subject in that colony, the use of the whip (in the field) is believed to be identified with the existence of slavery." Lord Bathurst directs that the whip shall be disused in the field, and altogether discontinued in the case of women, and that the punishment shall not be inflicted until the day after the offence, and in the presence of one free person, besides the owner or overseer. With respect to the exception of females from flogging, there can be no doubt of the importance of preserving that sex from the shocking exposure which such punishment makes unavoidable; but the planters appear at a loss to supply any other stimulus. Confinement is nearly without effect with their present habits, for the exemption which it affords from labour is more than a compensation for the restraint; and hard labour cannot be resorted to, as in our own prisons, since the whip would be necessary to compel the delinquent to work. The planters, therefore, have some reason for asserting, that to exempt the female slaves from corporal punishment, would be at once to proclaim freedom to one half of the slave population. Perhaps the worst part of female punishment—the exposure, might be considerably avoided if the punishment were inflicted by none but persons of the female sex.

The rest of Lord Bathurst's regulations, we consider not only as nugatory, but as highly mischievous. The owners and overseers, finding themselves deprived of the old modes of chastisement, will be racking their inventions to devise new ones, to which the regulations will not extend; and it is too probable that these will be much more cruel. Something of the kind is already taking place in Trinidad, where the regulations have been put into force. We are afraid that so long as the slave is made to work by fear, no material change can take place in this respect, and we see no hope of the substitution of another stimulus, until the state of things is radically altered. The only effective measure for preserving the slave from the abuse of the owner's power at present, would be to establish a law empowering the slave to change masters for ill treatment, as in the Spanish colonies, where any slave, on proof of bad treatment, may insist on being transferred to another master, at such a price as may be settled between the purchaser and the seller; in which case, if the latter be exorbitant in his demand, a third party is named as umpire.

It is manifest that the benefits of these or any other changes cannot be effectually secured to the slaves, unless the important point of receiving their evidence judiciously be conceded by the planters, who are more obstinate upon this than on any other subject. The objection to it is founded on one of the numerous fallacies which run through the system of English law. Instead of receiving testimony wherever it can be had, and of whatsoever sort, it is a principle with English lawyers to hamper it with difficult rules and qualifications which have generally the effect of excluding large classes of it, and those, too, of the highest importance in elucidating the case. One of the most objectionable of these rules is, the admission of no evidence unless proffered upon oath; this makes it incumbent upon the witness to understand what is called the "nature and obligation" of that sanction, which, in their turn, cannot be comprehended, unless he has received proper religious instruction, or at least, unless he holds a proper religious creed. The state of piety and morals is so low at present amongst the slaves, that their understandings will not grasp this knowledge, and therefore the planters, in accordance with the lawyers, maintain that their evidence is not to be credited. At best, that is only a reason for doubting, and not for excluding it. Lord Bathurst has confirmed this fallacious rule by recommending, that the testimony of slaves shall be received when they can produce from their clergymen or religious teachers, certificates that they are so far instructed in religious principles as to know the meaning of an oath. This will throw the decision of all causes, in which the production of slave evidence is essential, into the hands of the clergyman, who must be appointed by the owner, and consequently be more or less under his influence. But even this partial abolition of the old rule, excepts one case in which the evidence of slaves is more indispensable than in any other that can be imagined. Whites capitally charged are not to be affected by slave testimony. Therefore, they may murder the slaves with impunity, provided they do it when only slaves are by, and so as to avoid being inculpated by circumstantial evidence; and as by the new regulations, a white man forfeits his slaves after being twice convicted of cruelty, he has now only to slay them outright under the same precautions. The colonists object that the masters' lives would be exposed to jeopardy from the false evidence of the slaves. Strange confusion of ideas! As if there could be any danger from the machinations of witnesses, whose evidence the objection itself supposes to be generally known or suspected as false. But the notion which the colonists have of justice is still more extraordinary; for although they are chary of exposing themselves, they do not extend the same protection to the slaves, who are uniformly allowed to testify for or against one another. In some of the colonies, the people of colour and free blacks are exposed to it also, although they are sometimes the holders of considerable property; in Trinidad they possess half the estates in the island.

These measures of improvement are to be regarded as steps to the emancipation of the slaves; but there are many regulations which might be made, to render their present condition more happy. We shall confine ourselves to one which we deem to be more important than any other—the repeal of the monopoly which the West Indians possess of the sugar and coffee markets. That monopoly is at present supported by a protecting duty of 10s. per cwt. upon East India sugar, and of 3d. per lb. upon East India coffee. The West Indians do not allege that they have any claim, on the score of merit or past or present services, to levy these contributions on the consumers. Their main justification is, that the monopoly is necessary to the well-being of the slaves. They maintain, that the depression in price, which its abrogation would produce, would aggravate the misery and privation of the slaves, and, perhaps, expose them to starvation. With respect to starvation, the facts we have adduced already, put it out of the question; we, therefore, need not enlarge upon that head. We shall observe, however, that any thing which lowers the profits of the planters, lowers also the value of the slave, and consequently increases the willingness of the master to manumit him, as it diminishes the sacrifice. If the redemption be effected by the slave, out of his own means, it is obvious, that it is in like manner rendered more easy. The principal hardship, which it is alleged the slave would suffer from the depression, would be the overworking, which would be necessary in order to make up by an increase of the quantity of produce, for what is lost by the decrease in price. Now the effect of lower prices is a decrease rather than an increase of production; for an increase only lowers the price still further, whilst a decrease, which is the consequence of the state of prices not making it worth the planter's while to continue to grow, raises them again. Referring to the question of starvation, we may remark, that if low prices starve the slaves, they must operate through one of two means; viz., the master must either deprive the slave of the provision grounds, or appropriate the days allowed for their cultivation; but the effect of low prices in reducing production, shews that the temptation to do either is decreased rather than augmented. Let us suppose, however, that the practice prevails of distributing food to the slaves, instead of allowing them to raise it themselves. What will be the result? By this supposition, the labour of the plantation is entirely devoted to the culture of sugar or coffee, and it is by provisions purchased with part of this same sugar and coffee that the slaves are supported. If the abolition of the monopoly reduce profits so low that they will not afford a maintenance to the slaves, it is indisputable that they must starve if the owner be bent on carrying on that cultivation. But this is an insatiation which can be imputed only to insanity: for who can be supposed capable of persisting in a pursuit which not only yields him no remuneration, but destroys a principal part of his stock? The obvious course open to the planter is, to devote a part of his capital to the raising provisions on his estate for preserving his slaves. It is contrary, however, to all experience to suppose, that the planter would let his capital lie idle, which would be more or less the result of employing his slaves in raising their provisions for themselves. His attention would be turned to reducing the cost of raising his old commodity, or to raising other kinds of produce. Of all the products raised in the colonies, it appears that sugar yields the largest profits, and, as it is the staple commodity, it may be fairly concluded, that its profits fix the average rate which other products maintain by a more economical sort of cultivation. Now it is a remarkable fact, that the mortality amongst the slaves employed in raising sugar is greater than that in places where other articles are grown. Tobacco, cotton, and rice, are the staples of the slave states in North America, and the slaves there increase at the rate of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum. In the Bahamas, where no sugar is grown, the slaves increase at  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and in Barbadoes, where very little is grown, at  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum. But in St. Lucia, from 1819 to 1822, the decrease in the slaves was at the rate of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum, the quantity of sugar being about  $5\frac{1}{2}$  cwt. for each slave. In Tobago, in the same years, the decrease was at the rate of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the quantity of sugar 9 cwt. per slave. In St. Vincent's, from 1817 to 1822, the decrease was at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{2}$ , and the quantity of sugar 10 cwt. per slave. In Jamaica, from 1817 to 1820, the decrease was at the rate of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the quantity of sugar  $4\frac{1}{2}$  cwt. per slave. In Granada, during the same years, the decrease was at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the quantity of sugar 9 cwt. per slave. In Demerara, during the same years, the decrease was at the rate of between 2 and 3 per cent. per annum, and the quantity of sugar  $8\frac{1}{2}$  cwt. per slave; and in Trinidad, during the same period, the decrease was at the frightful rate of 3½ per cent. (a rate that would sweep off about half the inhabitants of the world in twenty years), and the quantity of sugar 12 cwt. per slave\*. What conclusion can be drawn from these facts? We are not aware that the unhealthiness of the sugar grounds is greater than that of other plantations; on the contrary, the cotton and rice grounds of the United States are rather esteemed the more unwholesome. We are, therefore, bound to believe, that this mortality arises from the high profits on sugar, which makes up for the neglect and sacrifice of the slaves. Where little or no economy is called for, it is obvious that the planter can afford this neglect and sacrifice; but where it is necessary, the planter resorts to good treatment, because it prevents the decay of their numbers, which he cannot afford to diminish. Any measure, therefore, which would oblige the planter to resort to a cheaper sugar-culture, or to raising other produce, would necessarily add to an improvement in the condition of the slaves. Economy in cultivation, has in some cases, not only led to considerable improvement, in the treatment of the slaves, but to a most important change in their habits, introducing, as it were, an inferior kind of independence. In Dutch Guiana, the competition of capitals and other difficulties which laid the colonists under the necessity of attending to the smallest savings, made them find out that task work was the most profitable manner of working the slaves, and it was universally adopted†; and in the Atlantic states of North America, where the staple articles are cotton, rice, and tobacco, which call for much attention to economy, task work is also in general use‡. The subject of this monopoly, considered simply with reference to the rights of the planters, has more properly formed part of another question\*, and need not be enlarged on here; but at all events, it derives no support from any supposed connexion it may have with the well-being of the slaves.

To return to the subject of enfranchisement. One of the chief means of hastening it would be to call a body of free labourers into existence, to work concurrently with the slaves, by giving the latter every fair opportunity of emancipation, consistent with the view we have taken of the principles of Negro labour in the West Indies. The best mode of emancipation is undoubtedly to give facilities to the slave himself to purchase his freedom. In the Spanish colonies the slave had a right to it by law, as soon as he could pay to his owner the sum he cost: but this regulation is obviously faulty; because it must be unjust towards the master, in case the value of the slave increase, whilst, if his price be taken at the time, great wrong may be done to the slave; for if he be able to redeem himself, it must be by his frugality and industry, so that the very qualities which make him worthy of his freedom, enhance his value, and, by consequence, the dearness of his ransom. Mr. Cooper, who went out to Jamaica, to instruct the Negroes on the estate of Mr. Hibbert, states, that he knew three valuable men who wished to purchase their freedom. They had long applied in vain to the resident agents of the proprietor. They at length, however, obtained their end by an application to the proprietor himself, then in England. After this, a fourth made many efforts to retain his freedom by purchase; but they proved unavailing, and he sank in consequence into a state of despondency, and became of comparatively little value†. Lord Bathurst, however, has chosen to adopt the latter plan, leaving the valuation to the award of a third party. The measure we should suggest is a graduated scale of prices adapted to the age, sex, and capacity of each slave, with a maximum, however, fixed rather above the highest rate that the best run of slaves sell for, beyond which the owner should not be allowed to push his demand, leaving it at the same time to the slave to make a cheaper bargain for himself if he could. The Spanish colonists had an excellent custom for the facilitation of self-redemption, which might be adopted as a law in our colonies; for nothing would tend more to give the slave industrious habits. As soon as he had accumulated by his industry and frugality the fifth part of his value, it was usual for the master on being paid the amount, to relinquish to the slave another day of the week, besides Sundays and holidays, and so on until he paid the whole of his ransom, and thus became altogether free. Perhaps such a regulation might be materially aided, if a fund were created by parliament to pay a small portion of the redemption price, such as a fifth or sixth. It would not need be large, because the slowness of the process would allow it to accumulate, at the same time that it would afford great encouragement to the slaves, and increase the confidence in the whites‡.

The question of voluntary manumission presents more difficulties. Simply to manumit the slave, without first teaching him habits of industry and honesty, would, in the first place, be doing him a very small benefit: for we presume, that a life of such indolence as to make them "the pests of society," as we have already seen the free Negroes described to be, will not be looked on as a very hopeful one; and, in the next place, a class of free idlers might have a fatal effect on the rest of the slaves, who ought to be kept out of the sight of indolence. The colonial laws in most of the islands, impose a fine upon the owner, on the voluntary manumission of his slave, sufficient for his support when free; and this fine is paid into the treasury of the colony for that purpose, or a bond is given to the same effect. These securities are required to prevent unfeeling persons from emancipating old and crippled slaves, in order to elude taxation, and the expense of maintenance. The fine we think unadvisable; but we are so far from looking at the bond in that light, that we should ther most to blame the frantic eagerness with which the former have pushed forward their views of emancipation, or the rage and obstinacy with which the latter have resisted every plan for amelioration. The former will make no allowance for the terrors of the latter, who alone are exposed to danger and loss; whilst the latter will make none for the abolitionists, whose feelings are harrowed up by occurrences, which cannot fail to attract the keenest sympathy of educated Europeans. Hence it is, that on a subject, in which both parties appeal to religion, humanity, and justice, language is in habitual use, which would disgrace two hostile clans of barbarians.

‡ Of the willingness of the slaves to purchase their own freedom, there is an extraordinary proof in Trinidad. From the 24th June to 24th December 1824, 89 slaves were manumitted, 69 of whom purchased their own freedom, and paid at the rate of 65*l.* sterling each. The slaves in that island are about 22,000: so that this is at the rate of 1½ per cent. per annum, and that in the first half year after the new regulation.—See additional papers in explanation of the measures of Government, laid before Parliament last session.

INDIA.—I. Burmese War.—II. Decan Prize Money.—III. *Hindoo Widows.

By a recent statute*, parliament is constituted almost the exclusive instrument of control over those who administer the affairs of India. It is not our purpose on the present occasion to inquire into the efficiency of the check thus established, though it may fairly be doubted, whether the laborious duty of a regular and searching supervision is likely to be fulfilled by a numerous body, collectively under no responsibility for any neglect of such duty, and individually having no interest in the performance of it. In point of fact, except when the case of an individual has been agitated,—the removal of a public functionary,—or some immediately exciting matter of comparatively narrow interest,—the mention of Indian affairs in parliament has seldom gone beyond a desultory conversation. The financial accounts of India, though exhibited annually, elicit no kind of observation; and the legislative enactments of the three presidencies have never yet been alluded to in the House.

The first subject brought forward last session, was a bill for regulating the salaries of the judges in India. As we have discussed the subject of judges' salaries at some length in another article, it will not be necessary to repeat here the observations which may be found in that article, and which are applicable to Indian as well as to English judgest.

The next topic was the removal of British subjects from India; returns of which removals from the year 1784 to the last session were called for by Mr. Hume, and ordered by the house. He particularly adverted to the removal of Mr. Buckingham and Mr. Arnot, but no steps were taken in that business.

Mr. Hume also made a motion on the subject of the mutiny of the Indian troops in November 1824, but as this was mixed up with a call for certain despatches of Lord Hastings in 1819, and with remarks on the Burmese war, and more particularly as the official accounts of the mutiny had not then arrived from India, the motion was rejected.

I. THE most important part of the discussion was that which regarded the causes and conduct of the Burmese war, and as this is likely to attract considerable attention in the next session, we shall present a brief statement of the merits of the question.

The eastern frontier of Bengal is a line of impenetrable forest and hills extending for nearly five degrees of latitude. In all this space there are but three known points of communication with the nations further east. The first and northernmost is by the valley of the Brahmapootra, in latitude 26° north, which is known as the country of Assam. The river is navigable for several hundred miles before it enters Rungpoor, the north easternmost district of the British possessions, and the valley is fruitful, though rather unhealthy.

The second is by the valley of the Soorma, in latitude 25° north, known by the name of the Kachar country, which is contiguous to the district of Sylhet on one side, and is bounded on the other by the mountains of Kossye. This river is likewise navigable beyond the British frontier, though very inferior to the Brahmapootra in size and consequence. There is no third opening until we come to the sea-coast, at the southern extremity of Chittagong, in latitude 21° north. The British boundary here touches on that of Arracan or Rykhung, from which it is separated by a navigable river called the Náf.

The reigning dynasty of the Burman empire commenced with Alompra, who flourished about the middle of the last century; and the Burmese have ever since been a conquering nation. They reduced Arracan in 1783, forcing the bulk of the population of the Moghada or Mufgrace, to take refuge within the Company's possessions. The Naf was then, and has on several occasions since, been recognized as the mutual boundary. At the mouth of this river there is an alluvial island covered for the most part with jungle, and separated from the promontory of Teknaf, which forms the northern bank, and on which the Company have long had a thana or police-post, by a fordable channel. The main stream, which is navigable for vessels of considerable burthen, and nearly a mile wide, divides the island from Mungdoo, the extreme northern post of the Burmese in Arracan. This island is called Shahpooree, and has never yielded any thing except fire-wood. The Burmese preferred a claim to it as theirs by long established right; but the island was never inhabited, or otherwise occupied. The British officers denied this right, and claimed the island for the Company, resting their claim partly on the position of the island, which by the law of alluvion would make it theirs, and partly on the assertion, that it had always been considered as theirs, and had been included in their maps and territorial surveys. The case was referred to the Supreme Government, when Mr. Adam determined to maintain the British right. He addressed a letter to the Arracan authorities, stating this resolution, and at the same time ordered the island to be occupied by a party of the local corps, stationed for civil duties at Chittagong. Thus matters stood upon Lord Amherst's arrival. The Burmese officers, without answering the letter, sent messages to the police-officer of Teknaf, requiring him to withdraw the detachment, and threatening to employ force for its removal. No attention being paid to these threats, the Burmese on the 24th of September, 1823, landed on Shahpooree in a night attack, and drove away the party stationed there, with the loss of several lives.

Considering the nature of the quarrel, and the worthlessness of the object in dispute, it might have been wise to have sought to explain away the affront, and to have aimed at procuring some such compromise as would have prevented an open rupture: the more so, as it appears, that the Burmese would have been satisfied at one time with an engagement from us not to occupy the island of Shahpooree, and that they would probably have engaged not to occupy it themselves. But it seems pretty clear, that whatever might have been done on this part of the frontier, matters must still have been brought to a rupture with the Burmese at other points, and therefore that concession might only have operated as an encouragement to the assailants. We allude to the Kachar dispute, which was briefly as follows: Muneepoor is the capital of that part of Kossye which borders on Kachar, and, through it, lies the direct route from Umerapoor to Assam. In 1773 it was conquered by the Burmese, but their tenure was always precarious, the inhabitants flying to the hills and fortresses, and at different intervals recovering their capital. About 15 years ago, that is in the time of Lord Minto, the Muneepooreans being pushed to the south east, indemnified themselves at the expense of their western neighbours of Kachar, who being a race of pusillanimous Bengalees, under a Raja without energy, resources, or influence, were easily reduced to subjection. The Raja (Govind Chundur) took refuge within the Company's possessions, where after much indecision as to whether or not he should be supported in an attempt to recover his territory, he was finally allowed an asylum, on the condition of not disturbing the peace of the frontier. Until 1820, Kachar was with Muneepoor, under the joint authority of the hereditary enemies of the Burmese, and in that year the power was in the hands of two brothers, Chorjeet and Marjeet, with their cousin Gumbheer Singh. In that year, however, the Burmese sent a larger force than usual, under a general called Mengee Maha Silooa, and he, after reducing Muneepoor, prosecuted his conquests into the eastern parts of Assam. The three Muneepoor chiefs, yielding to circumstances, retired: Gumbheer Singh to the mountains; and the two brothers into Kachar: but availing themselves of the absence of the Burmese in Assam, they united shortly after, and recovered Muneepoor. They did not, however, hold it long, for a yet larger army, under the victorious Mengee Maha Bandoola, retook Muneepoor, and then advancing into Assam, completed the conquest of that valley, and defeated its Raja, Chundur Kunt, in a battle fought almost in sight of the British post at Jugeegopa, on the Brahmapootra.

The Burmese, be it observed, are not content with taking the revenues, and conducting the administration of the countries they subdue. This is a refinement of European warfare. Less civilized nations always aim at the extermination of their enemies: such at least is the invariable policy of the Burmese. This system had begun to operate in Assam in 1822 and 1823. The population was retiring in masses before their conquerors within the British frontier, and although military posts were established at Jugeogopa and Gwalpara for their protection, these were insufficient to prevent repeated violations of the frontier, by parties of Burmese who came in search of the property or persons of the refugees. As yet, the Burmese had neglected Kachar, deeming it part of Bengal, and respecting it apparently on that account. The Supreme Government, however, disquieted by the recent successes of this nation in Assam, resolved to make their stand on the Kaohar rather than on their own immediate frontier. The Burmese had no claim whatever to that territory, while Marjeet and Chorjeet were both anxious to place it under our protection, and the exiled Raja was no less solicitous to see it rescued from such a race of conquerors. Under these circumstances Kachar was declared under protection, and an asylum given to Chorjeet and Marjeet*. In the meantime, as was expected, the Burmese in their inveteracy against the Muneepooreans, sent another expedition for their extirpation, and appeared in Kachar on the Assam route, as well as on the direct road from Muneepoor, claiming, not possession of that country, but that the persons of these refugees should be given up to their vengeance. This demand they declared themselves prepared to enforce by an immediate appeal to arms, and by following their enemy even to the further end of Hindostan if necessary. Thus, without any reference on the part of the Burman leaders to the dispute about Shahpooree, matters were unavoidably brought to the issue of direct hostility with the British troops advanced to the frontier in this quarter. The first gun was fired by the Burmese on the 17th of January, 1824, while the Supreme Government were waiting a reply to the letter addressed to Umerapoor, complaining of the outrage at Shahpooree of the preceding September.

It seems manifest from the above statement, that Lord Amherst was dragged into the war by a train of events to which no prudence and no submission on his part could have given another turn. We might support this conclusion, were it necessary, by an appeal to the subsequent conduct of the Burmese on the Arracan frontier; for they not only rejected every offer to negotiate their differences there, but shewed a settled determination to maintain their pretensions at all hazards, and committed various acts of a most unfriendly character in prosecution of this determination.

We now come to the second question; as to the manner in which the war has been conducted. It is clear, that the only legitimate aim of measures to be undertaken against a horde of barbarians, like the Burmese, is, first, self-defence, and secondly, security against a repetition of violence. Conquest and the acquisition of territory ought not to be the motive for hostilities, except as conducive to this second end: the most sanguine politician could never dream that the future profit to be obtained from such a nation would ever repay the outlay requisite to achieve the conquest.

On first hearing of the attack on Shahpooree, Lord Amherst and his council appear to have felt much indignation. An immediate expedition to Arracan was resolved upon; ships seem absolutely to have been taken up; and a commander† was even named for the enterprise. The object of this, was, to impress the enemy with respect for our power, and to frighten them into concession. However, the plan was relinquished as suddenly as it had been adopted, and in the midst of the preparations for its execution. It was resolved, instead, to send a few companies of regular troops to re-occupy Shahpooree, and to prefer a written complaint against the frontier officer in a letter to Umerapoor, so as to give the opportunity of disavowal, before making the case a matter of peace or war with the Burman nation. — This plan was adopted in * The asylum must have been afforded at any rate, so that it was merely a question when the government should step in between the Burmese and their prey, whether before or after the loss of Kachar.

October, 1823. No answer having been returned from Umerapoor by the beginning of March, 1824, a formal manifesto and declaration of war was then published in the gazette. But hostilities had already commenced on the Kachar frontier, and Shahpooree proving too unheathy for a post, our troops had been withdrawn, when the Burmese re-hoisted their flag there with much parade; in fact there had been war since January, and in the delay of the proclamation, the season for military operations was allowed to draw to a close. War, however, being thus declared in the beginning of March, it is by the measures then taken, that Lord Amherst's fitness for his station must be judged. Information was sought in all quarters, and an officer was summoned to Calcutta, who had been twice to Umerapoor, and twice to Rangoon. This was Major Canning, who gave his counsel some time in the beginning of March. Up to this date the Supreme Government had no thought of an expedition to Rangoon; the Major however had no sooner reached the presidency, than without consultation with the commander in chief, who was on a tour of inspection to the west, expresses were sent to Madras, to urge the instant embarkation of 10,000 men thence, for Rangoon, while 3,000 were immediately put on shipboard for the same destination, from Bengal. The hurry with which this expedition was determined upon, is a peculiar feature of the case. The resolution was even more sudden than that before adopted and abandoned, in regard to Arracan. The reins of government seem to have been abandoned to Major Canning, and the nation has been led into a set of measures which, so far as we see at present, can only end in a war of extermination and conquest.

But how were matters conducted in the field? The expense of this expedition, from the union of land and naval armaments, and the large proportion of European troops, was beyond any thing before known in India, and demanded at least some deliberation. This expense was absolutely thrown away during six months of rainy season, and it was known before hand, that this season would commence about the time the expedition would reach Rangoon. It was known too, that while the troops lay inactive on account of the rains, all supplies were to be furnished from Bengal, and that their transmission (from the monsoon being adverse) must be difficult, irregular, and inordinately expensive. Then the rain, the bad quarters, and insufficient supplies, produced extreme unhealthiness, and a great mortality ensued. The very means of defence at home being crippled, in order to send out this expedition, the enemy were invited to attempt our frontier, where a disaster was experienced, most alarming to the safety of our Indian empire.

All these consequences ensued from the unfortunate time chosen for fitting out this expedition to Rangoon: all these consequences might have been foreseen; and it was not too much to expect of the Supreme Director of the affairs of the nation in India, that he should have had the knowledge and good sense to anticipate them.

The undivided responsibility for the Rangoon expedition lies now on Lord Amherst. The Major, who advised it, is dead; the only member of council who participated in the determination, is out by rotation; and the Commander-in-chief of Bengal, who was absent from Calcutta at the time of the expedition, has evidently never concurred in the measure, if he did not oppose it.

The operations against Assam, and for the expulsion of the Burmese from Kachar, were indispensable for security and self-defence, and need no comment. The expedition sent in the following season against Arracan, was likewise a necessary effort to redeem the loss of character sustained on that frontier; but the bulk of this force should have been withdrawn upon its success before the commencement of the rains. Of the expedition to Rangoon, however, with all its consequences, the reduction of Martaban and Mirgui, with the places on the Tenasserim coast, and the subsequent advance and establishment of the force at Prome, we see but one issue—a war of extermination with the Burmese nation, and the aggrandizement of our empire in India, by the retention of every inch of the territory. The end with a view to which the war should have been undertaken, has thus been quite lost sight of for operations, which, though at the lowest estimate they have cost several millions sterling, were not necessary for the mere purpose of producing such an impression on the enemy as should prevent a repetition of insult.

II. THE next subject which engaged the attention of the House with regard to Indian affairs, was the distribution of the Deccan prize-money. We have been at some pains to ascertain the merits of this question, and the following is the result of our inquiry.

When the Marquis of Hastings planned the operations for suppressing the Pindarees, and other predatory hordes of Central India, he had to keep in view,—First, the character of the enemy's force, which, like quicksilver, would divide upon collision, and re-unite in various directions;—secondly, the probability that the Mahratta powers, or some of them, would make common cause with the depredators. In this state of things, it seemed expedient to form as many separate armies as possible; some, to beset the avowed enemy; others, to watch the conduct of suspected friends. This was the plan adopted, and for its execution, the whole disposable force of the three presidencies was ordered into the field. Lord Hastings placed himself in a central position in Hindostan, to superintend the operations, and prescribed the formation of every separate force, and the line on which it should act. In order, however, to bring up the resources of Madras, and give consistency to the movements on that side, Sir Thomas Hislop, the commander-in-chief of that presidency, was ordered into the field by his lordship, and the several armies formed to the south of the Nerbudda, made up partly of Bengal troops, but chiefly of those of Madras and Bombay, together with the reformed troops of our allies, were constituted into divisions of the army of the Deccan. All these Sir Thomas was nominally to command in subordinate co-operation with the divisions of the grand army of Hindostan, of which Lord Hastings was the commander-in-chief. Thus commenced the campaign entirely under his lordship's personal direction. While, however, the armies brought up from the south, were, with those from the west and from Hindostan, sweeping the tract where the Pindarees lay,—the two Mahratta powers most strictly in alliance with us, viz. the Peshwa and Bhoosla broke out into hostility behind the line of our operations. A third, the Holkur Darbar, made common cause with the freebooters, and met our advancing armies in the field. All were ultimately overpowered; the Pindarees, however, with Holkur, soonest; so much so, that the operations for sweeping the Pindaree country, being finally concluded in January and February 1818, an entirely new distribution of all the forces was then made under Lord Hastings' orders, and the nominal distinction of army of the Deccan was done away. This occurred in the midst of the operations against the Peshwa and Bhoosla, which were not finally concluded till the capture of Aseergurh in April 1819. Though delayed somewhat beyond the occasion, the final orders for dissolving the army of the Deccan were published by Sir Thomas Hislop himself, on the 31st of March 1818, and Sir Thomas, immediately after, returned by sea to Madras. It appears, that in the conjoint operations against the Pindarees, very little booty was taken; whereas, the forces left originally to watch, and afterwards employed against the Peshwa and Bhoosla, and those sent to help them, took a great deal, some before, but most, after the dissolution of the army of the Deccan, of which, while the name lasted, some, though not all, were nominal divisions. Sundry questions arose as to the distribution of this booty, and as all booty in theory belongs to the crown, it was for His Majesty with the advice of his Lords of the Treasury to decide. Lord Hastings seeing the impossibility of determining in all cases to whom the booty should belong, recommended that the whole should be formed into a fund for the benefit of all the troops employed in any way in the different operations, and a claim was preferred on his part, in England, to share as commander-in-chief. This was resisted by Sir Thomas Hislop and his staff, who claimed to be commander-in-chief and general staff for the army of the Deccan, and who desired such a distribution as would exclude the Hindostan troops, and their commander. The pretensions of all parties having been fully argued before the Lords of the Treasury, the majority of these lords determined (against, it is said, the opinion of their chief,) that the booty should not be formed into a general fund, and that the claim of Lord Hastings, as commander-in-chief of all the armies, should be disallowed. The principle of actual capture was to be adhered to as far as possible, with an exception in favour of one detachment of the Hindostan army, sent down to assist in the operations against Nagpoor: and with the addition, that the East India Company should have none of the booty.

The Duke of Wellington and Mr. Arbuthnot, of the Treasury, were, on the 22d of March, 1823, made trustees to collect the booty, and prepare a scheme of distribution on the principles so declared. Mr. Atcheson was solicitor for Sir Thomas Hislop and the staff and army of the Deccan. Having carried his point with the Lords of the Treasury, he proceeded to lay before the trustees, statements of the booty claimed for his constituents. The trustees took his information as long as he had any to give, but refused altogether to place themselves on confidential terms of intercourse, or to lend themselves to his views in contesting with the East India Company various extensive claims set up by him. The trustees seem, indeed, to have considered him as preferring claims on behalf of the Deccan army, such as no officer would ever have thought of advancing. Mr. Atcheson's statements are before the public, and the principle on which he proceeds seems to be, that all the advantage obtained by the East India Company from the war, is to be considered as military booty, and that the Company should therefore not only refund all it had obtained in cash, but, further, purchase of the army all prospective advantages, all palaces and public buildings, and even all additions to the revenue that have resulted from the war. Dismayed at these pretensions, the trustees sought to cut off all further communication with Mr. Atcheson, by opening a direct correspondence with Sir Thomas Hislop and the military men sent home as prize-agents. Mr. Atcheson continued to address letters to the trustees, enclosing the opinions of counsel, and insisting that the trustees should communicate with him as sole law-agent for the Deccan army. The principal matter in which Mr. Atcheson required to be dealt with thus confidentially, was this: the trustees had received his statements of booty, and had submitted the statements to the law-officers of the Crown, by whose opinion they and the Treasury were resolved to be guided. Mr. Atcheson insisted that the opinions so given by the crown-lawyers should be communicated to him, that he might submit them to other counsel on the part of the Deccan army. The trustees refused Mr. Atcheson's request. They further expressed their opinion, that there was too much disposition shown to go to law; but offered to submit all the proceedings to Sir Thomas Hislop's inspection, or that of any number of officers of his army.

A petition was next presented to parliament from Colonel Fitz-Simon, of the Deccan army, complaining of the delays tarrown in the way of the distribution, and attributing them, in plain terms, to the trustees, and their refusal to admit Mr. Atcheson to their confidence. Dr. Lushington then declared the parties to have been insulted, in a letter from the Duke of Wellington, and imputed the opposition Mr. Atcheson had experienced to his refusal to allow a son of Mr. Arbuthnot to be nominated a joint prize-agent. The fact is undoubted, that such a nomination was in agitation, and was given up after, if not in consequence of, the opposition made to it by the existing prize and law agent. The matter might have ended here, but for the anxiety of the military friends of the noble Duke to stand forth as his defenders. On the third day only, after the reading of Colonel Fitz-Simon's petition, another petition was produced, asserting the perfect satisfaction of the Madras army at the conduct of the trustees, and bearing the signature of Sir J. Malcolm, with that of three other officers, in respect to whom it came out, that one being in Scotland, a friend had taken upon himself to sign his name. Mr. Atcheson's bill was stated in parliament to amount, at that time, to about 17,000*l.*; at present, we hear it amounts to about 25 or 30,000*l.* And it was against proceedings calculated to increase this bill, that the trustees set their faces.

A third and a fourth petition were presented to the House of Commons on the same subject, one from Sir Evan John Murray McGregor, a sharer, disavowing the declaration of general satisfaction put into the mouth of the army by Sir John Malcolm; and the other from Mr. Atcheson, exculpating himself from the charge of desiring to promote litigation, and complaining of the treatment he had experienced at the hands of the trustees.

their endeavours to realize and divide the booty according to the principle laid down by the majority of the Lords of the Treasury. A difficulty, however, has now been started, which will probably operate to deprive Sir Thomas Hislop and the army of the Deccan, of much which they have long looked upon as their own.

In so far as the booty captured from the Peshwa or Bhoosla was taken in forts or camps which fell before the conquering armies, the principle of actual capture might well be applied; and if the capture were made before the dissolution of the army of the Deccan, Sir Thomas Hislop and his staff might claim the usual proportions of commander-in-chief and staff over the divisions which made the capture. But much, indeed the bulk, of the amount claimed on the part of the army, was state-prize, which fell to the civil officers of the government that succeeded the Peshwa and Bhoosla; and how was it possible to apply the principle of actual capture to such booty? Thus Baja Row Peshwa had sent the bulk of his state-jewels to be concealed in a private house in the open town of Nāsik. Information of the hoard was given to Mr. Elphinstone, the civil commissioner, some time after the dissolution of the army of the Deccan, and when a few operations against the Arabs of Kandés were all that remained to complete the reduction of the country. Mr. Elphinstone sent immediate orders to his civil deputy in that part of the country, who happened to be a military man (Captain Briggs), and he proceeded with a small personal escort, borrowed from the force of Colonel M'Dowall, to take possession of these jewels. Had the crown been the governing authority of India, the prize would probably have been deemed a droit, so as not to fall to the army: but the governing authority happening to be the Company, which is precluded from any right or interest in booty resulting from war, the crown has ordered the Nāsik jewels to go to the army. Upon the principle of actual capture, however, Mr. Elphinstone, who directed the operation, must be the commander-in-chief, and Captain Briggs, his civil assistant, the actual captor. Neither Sir Thomas Hislop nor his staff can have a better claim than any other indifferent person. But if there be absurdity in the principle of actual capture, as applied to these jewels, there is still greater in respect to two other items claimed for the Deccan army, viz.: first, a sum of money deposited by Bajee Rao, with a native banker of Bombay, and recovered from him by proceedings in the Recorder's court, conducted by the Company's Advocate-General there; and, secondly, a large quantity of jewels sent from Nagpoor for deposit at Bunares, with a merchant of that city, and for the recovery of which suits have been instituted in the native courts of Bengal, which so far as we are informed, are still undetermined. Who, we would ask, are the actual captors in these two instances? And yet these items, as state-prize, which the Company is not entitled to, will probably be awarded to the army. The last-mentioned jewels it was intended by the Bengal government, to restore to the Raja, by whom Apa Saheb has been succeeded at Nagpoor, but the award of the Treasury Lords has deprived the Company of all power of disposing of them, and if they be now restored, it must be after re-purchase from the army. These difficulties were inherent in the case from the beginning, and suggested the recommendation of the Marquis of Hastings, that all the booty should be thrown into a general fund. They must have been fully argued by the counsel employed in support of that side, and yet, it appears, that the majority of the Treasury Lords were not convinced until the trustees, finding the difficulty of applying the principle of actual capture to their award, reported the same for further judgment. The arguments of both sides on this part of the case were again heard by the Treasury, on the 7th of January 1826, and the case now awaits the decision of that tribunal.

III. A short discussion took place, before the close of the session, on the Suttees, or burning of Indian widows on the funeral pile of their deceased husbands.

This rite, which is a form of public suicide, seems so strongly sanctioned among the Hindoos by religion and custom, that it would be difficult, if not impossible to suppress it by direct legislative interference.

The Hindoos maintain, that the true Suttee need not burn publicly, but even if prohibited, will pine away and die, for the sake of joining her husband in paradise.

The presence of the police-officers under the system now pursued on these occasions in India, may tend to assure us, that the suffering, or at any rate the going forth to suffer, is not the result of any other compulsion than that which is occasioned by superstition and family pride. If this be so, it seems hopeless to expect any alteration, except in the progress of truth, and the decay of superstition; and it may fairly be asked, whether those members of the House whose imaginations seem so deeply affected, by this distant, irremediable, and comparatively small amount of suffering, might not employ their time and faculties better, by attempting to remove the causes of misery prevailing to an enormous extent in their own country, and for the removal of which little more is requisite than a moderate portion of disinterestedness.

FINANCE AND TRADE.

I. The Budget—Assessed Taxes—Spirit Duties—Beer Duties, &c. &c.—II. *Foreign Trade, &c. &c.

IN order to simplify, as much as possible, the subject of which we are about to treat, we shall divide it into two parts. We shall consider, in the first place, those taxes and duties which are imposed for the sake of raising a revenue to defray the expenses of government; and secondly, those of which the objects are of a different nature, as, for instance, the protection of manufactures, the encouragement of shipping, or the formation of advantageous political connexions with other countries.

I. IN entering upon the first of these subjects, we may observe, that whilst, on the one hand, we disagree with those metaphorical reasoners who would persuade us that the money which is taken in taxes is not really taken from the people—a proposition which has been proved by a simile, in which taxes are made to resemble the moisture which, being first drawn up from the earth, is sent back to it in refreshing showers; neither on the other, can we coincide in opinion with a certain worthy county member, who is reported to have made it a subject of self-congratulation, at a meeting of his constituents, that he had never voted in favour of any tax. Taxation is, in fact, the price which we pay for government; and our object in this, as in all other purchases, should be, to obtain the best article we can at the lowest price. For this purpose it is necessary not only that the affairs of government should be conducted with the greatest wisdom and economy, but also that the revenue which is required should be levied in such a manner as to occasion the smallest possible loss of enjoyment to the contributors. It is on this subject alone that it is our province at present to treat. We have nothing to do with the amount of the sinking fund, the standing army, and other like objects, which have found their way into the debates on taxation. In this place we must assume that a certain revenue is necessary, and we have only to inquire how it may be raised in the most advantageous manner.

A striking alteration has taken place, during the last four years, in the management of this department of our government, by the resignation of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Vansittart, now Lord Bexley; a minister who repeatedly proved himself to be ignorant of some of the simplest of those principles which ought to have guided his conduct, and who, in several instances, systematically persevered, year after year, in increasing duties, when he might have learned from the returns, that the only effect of such increase was the rapid reduction of the revenue*. Mr. Robinson has, therefore, had the peculiar good fortune, on entering into office, to be enabled at the same time to reduce taxation and to increase the revenue. As it may be useful to ascertain how and in what cases these desirable objects may be effected; and as it is a subject which we believe has been never very fully explained; we shall not apologize for enlarging on this topic. We do so with the less hesitation, as by laying down some of the general principles of taxation in the first instance, we shall facilitate our subsequent inquiries.

We may of course assume that the whole annual revenue of the inhabitants of every country, whether they be productive or unproductive consumers, is expended on the various articles produced by labour and capital. We may also take for granted, that the relative quantities of the articles consumed, will depend upon two circumstances, viz. the desire of the consumer for the article in question, and the cost of producing it; that it will be directly as the former, and inversely as the latter. Now if an equal ad valorem duty be laid upon all commodities, it is clear that their relative prices will remain unaltered; and if we suppose the relative desire of the consumer for the different commodities to remain the same*, the relative consumption of each article will remain unchanged, and the tax will fall equally upon all consumers, exactly in proportion to the value of the commodities which they consume. Let us now suppose the tax upon some one commodity to be greatly increased, so as to raise its price to such a degree as greatly to diminish, or entirely prevent, its consumption. It is evident that the whole, or a great part, of the income which was formerly expended upon this article, will now be employed in the purchase of other commodities. The revenue, therefore, will not be increased in proportion to the increase of taxation; but at the same time, it will not be diminished, because these other commodities will remain taxed to the same extent as before. But since, in all countries, there are some articles which are taxed either not at all or to a very small amount, it is evident that, if the consumer should have recourse, as he probably would, to these articles, the revenue would actually be diminished by increasing the tax. It is in this way alone that an increase of taxation can be attended by a diminution of revenue. For let us put a different case. Let us suppose that an equal ad valorem duty is laid upon all commodities except one, which either is altogether exempt, or is taxed only to a small amount. If this article be now subjected to the same taxation as the rest, it is obvious that its consumption will be probably greatly diminished, or that it may cease altogether, and that consequently the produce of the tax on this particular commodity, will be diminished to little or nothing. But since the income which was formerly expended on this untaxed article, must now be employed in the purchase of taxed commodities, it follows that the whole revenue of the state, instead of being diminished, may be increased. From these considerations, we think we are justified in drawing the following conclusions. First, that there is not, as is often supposed, an absolute limit to every duty, beyond which an increase of taxation necessarily occasions a loss of revenue; but that this loss is the consequence, not of high but of unequal taxation. Secondly, that even when it appears from the returns that the increase of a tax on any article has caused a diminution of revenue on that particular article, it does not necessarily follow that it has caused a loss to the revenue generally, because the loss may be made up by an increased consumption of other articles, taxed to an equal or greater amount. But whenever an increase of duty is attended by a diminution of revenue on an article more highly taxed than the average of the commodities of the country, we may generally conclude that the additional taxation has been unprofitable or pernicious. Thirdly, it appears that inequality of taxation is generally injurious in the three following ways: 1st, in causing a loss to the revenue; 2dly, in producing inconvenience to the consumer, inasmuch as it narrows his choice of the articles of consumption; 3dly, in causing injury to the producer and the merchant, by whom such articles are distributed, by compelling a transfer of their capital from one employment to another a process which can rarely be accomplished without both inconvenience and loss.

There is also another consideration of great importance, which would lead us to disapprove of unequal taxation; we mean the encouragement which it affords to smuggling. It is quite unnecessary to detail the injurious consequences which result from this offence, or to demonstrate the impossibility of preventing its continuance so long as the present high duties exist, as these topics are a constant subject of discussion, both in and out of parliament. It may be sufficient to remark, that its prejudicial effects to the community may be classed under the three following heads:—1st, as it occasions a direct loss to the revenue; 2nd, as it gives rise to an enormous expense in the maintenance of a police, and a military and naval force for the preventive service; and, 3d, as it tends to injure the morals of the people, by familiarizing them with the violation of the law—a violation which is attended with considerable profit, without subjecting the offender to popular odium. The inducement to smuggle depends, of course, upon the profit of the smuggler; and it is evident, that with some slight limitations, this profit amounts to the whole of the duties due upon the smuggled goods, deducting the additional expenses occasioned by the peculiar difficulties of the contraband trade and the occasional losses from detection. The duties upon some articles are at this moment so high, that we have heard it stated, that if the smuggler can land in safety only one cargo out of three, he will be amply recompensed for his trouble and expence, though he lose the other two. In order then to diminish to the utmost the inducement to smuggle, we should endeavour to reduce all our duties to the lowest possible rate; that is, we should make them all, as nearly as possible, equal ad valorem duties. A very common error has prevailed amongst legislators on this subject. It has been thought, that if an article, from any cause, becomes reduced in price, it is the better able to bear taxation; and the proposition is perfectly true, if it be meant that Government is the less likely to receive complaints from the contributors. But if the prevention of smuggling be a desirable object, instead of increasing we ought to diminish the duty with the diminution of the price of the article; because the temptation to smuggle is, as we have shown, nearly proportioned to the amount of the ad valorem duty.

* We have assumed, throughout the whole of this inquiry, that the relative desires of the consumer for different commodities will remain the same, provided their relative price be unaltered. This is not, however, strictly true; since, if taxation be raised to a great amount, the consumer would probably resign some of the luxuries in preference to the necessities of life. To have made allowance for this circumstance would, however, have greatly complicated our statement, and the assumption is sufficiently accurate for our present purpose.

In adapting the principle we have just expounded to practice, considerable modifications will be required. In the present state of this country it would be necessary to proceed to the equalization of our various duties with a cautious hand, and with a careful regard to existing interests. It might be also necessary to introduce some permanent modifications of the principles which we have endeavoured to establish. Thus, for instance, there may be some commodities on which it might be desirable to impose little or no duty, either on account of the peculiar difficulties of producing them, the facility of smuggling, or from other moral or political considerations. It is satisfactory to find, that correct principles on these subjects are gradually working their way from the study of the philosopher into the Cabinet, and the House of Commons. Not many years have elapsed since such principles were mentioned in parliament only to be treated with contempt, as the visionary speculations of theoretical reasoners, whereas at present, owing, we must say, to the efforts of Mr. Ricardo (whose irreparable loss we are only beginning to deplore), and to the liberal opinions of the more enlightened part of the Cabinet, there appears to be every probability of their forming a permanent basis of our financial system. Our prospects are the more encouraging, as all the liberal measures of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer have hitherto been attended with signal success; and, instead of the revenue being diminished, it is calculated that at the expiration of this and the two following years, there will be a clear surplus to the amount of upwards of four millions*. It became a most important question to determine in what way this surplus of revenue should be disposed of, so as to afford the greatest relief to the people; a question which under one shape or other was the subject of most of the financial debates during the last Session of Parliament. Two different plans have been proposed for this purpose: the one, to abolish altogether the house and window duty, and the rest of the assessed taxes; the other, to reduce those duties which press upon our trade and manufactures. The former of these measures was certainly the more popular, and was warmly supported by most of the members for large towns; but the latter was adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The assessed taxes are unpopular because they are paid directly by the consumer to the tax-gatherer; whereas, when the duty is imposed upon an article in the course of its manufacture, the consumer probably is not aware, or forgets, how large a proportion of the price is caused by the tax. It is, of course, a mere fallacy to suppose that, because the process is less direct, the duty is not as certainly paid by the consumer in the latter case as in the former. Instead, therefore, of considering the circumstances which attend the collection of the assessed taxes as a disadvantage, we consider them to be precisely the reverse; because we think it highly desirable that the people should be acquainted with the sums which they really contribute towards the expenses of the state. There is also another advantage attending the assessed taxes, too considerable to be passed over in silence, which is, that they are not easily evaded, and that the expence of their collection is comparatively small, being not more than 5l. 15s. 8d. per cent. A variety of objections have, however, been urged against them, the force of which it is our present object to consider.

It has been stated by many members, that they fall oppressively upon the poor. Now, without examining the question, whether those taxes which are charged upon the poorer classes are really paid by them in the end, and without inquiring whether the principle be correct—that is, the principle of taxing the incomes of the rich in a greater proportion than those of the poor;—it may be sufficient to observe, that the fact is in this case mis-stated: since all houses, of which the annual rent does not exceed 10l., are now exempt from the house-tax, and all, in which the number of windows does not exceed 7, are exempt from the window-tax; so that, in fact, the labouring classes, and the very small capitalists, are no longer called upon for any direct contribution towards the assessed taxes*.

Another argument has been urged in favour of the repeal of these duties, by Mr. Leicester, who is reported to have given it as his opinion, that if “these taxes were taken off, the revenue would lose nothing, as the country would be richer, and the consumption on all hands would be greater†.” Now we cannot imagine that any person who candidly inquires into this subject, will maintain, that the present rate of these duties is so high as in any great degree to limit the consumption of the articles on which they are imposed. Indeed, this argument, if it would hold at all, seems to be properly directed not so much against the existence of these duties, as against their amount.

There is an important subject, with regard to the house and window duties, which does not appear to have been touched upon by any speaker in the House of Commons, in the course of the debates; we mean the question, On what classes of the community they ultimately fall? It seems to have been assumed by all parties, as a matter of course, that they are in all cases really paid by the persons on whom they are nominally charged; an opinion which we shall easily discover to be far from correct. The house-tax is an annual percentage on the estimated rent. Now in ordinary cases, where a house possesses no peculiar advantages of situation, its rent amounts to little more than the usual profits of stock upon the capital which has been expended in its construction. It is evident, therefore, that in this case no part of the tax can fall upon the owner, because, if it were so to do, the profits derived from this particular employment of capital would be reduced below the usual rate. Since then the tax will not be paid out of the rent of the owner, it must fall upon the consumer, and will operate exactly in the same manner as an increased expence in the annual repairs. When the house is occupied merely as a residence, and not for the purposes of trade, it will fall entirely upon the tenant; exactly in the same manner as duties upon carriages and horses. But when the house is occupied either wholly or in part as a shop or manufactory, the tax will be paid either wholly or in part by the consumers of the goods which are sold or manufactured on the premises; since it must operate in raising the prices of the commodities, exactly in the same manner as a tax upon the machinery by which they are manufactured‡. Precisely the same argument will hold with regard to the window-tax, which, it may be shewn in the same manner, will fall in the one case on the tenant, in the other upon the consumer,

* We consider this exemption from the window-duty to be peculiarly advantageous in a different point of view; that duty was certainly a tax upon the light and air, and consequently upon the health and cleanliness of the lower orders.

† Ante, p. 358.

‡ We of course suppose the trade or manufactory to be of such a nature as to require the residence of some person on the premises, and consequently to subject the building to the house duty.

but never upon the owner. Yet we find Mr. Hobhouse, in his speech, on moving for the repeal of the window-tax, declaring that "no benefit had resulted to the poorer classes from the repeal of the window duties on houses having not more than seven windows, because the tax was paid not by the tenants, but by the landlords*." We may just observe, that if this statement had been true, it would have furnished an excellent argument for his opponents; but we think we have already said enough to prove that it is incorrect.

We come next to consider the case of those houses, of which the rent does not consist wholly of the profits of the capital expended in their construction, but for which an additional sum is paid by the tenant on account of peculiar advantages of situation. This additional sum is all which would come under the denomination of rent in the strict sense of the term. Now, since the utmost which the tenant is willing to pay for these peculiar advantages, is, of course, obtained by the owner; and since there is no reason why the imposition of this duty should make him willing to pay more; it follows that the tax, so far as it falls upon this portion of the rent, is paid not by the tenant, but by the owner. We see, therefore, how unfounded are the complaints of some of the inhabitants of London and other large towns, who imagine that the house-tax presses with peculiar severity upon them. It is perfectly true that their houses are charged at a higher rate than houses of a similar kind in the country, because they pay a greater rent; but if this additional charge were to be abolished, the tenant would receive no relief, as it would enable the owner to raise his rent just so much the higher. Indeed, we are of opinion, that amongst all the taxes which at present exist in this country, there is none which is altogether so unexceptionable as this part of the house-tax which falls upon rent strictly so called, as it is paid solely by the owner, and has no tendency either to diminish profits or to increase the price of any commodity. Even by the owner this tax can now scarcely be considered as oppressive, because he has, probably, in most cases purchased the property subject to the tax; and because the duty increases progressively with the increase of his income—an increase which is the effect, not of his own exertions, but of circumstances over which he has no control.

Before we take leave of the subject of the assessed taxes, it will be right to notice an objection to the window-tax on which Mr. Hobhouse has laid great stress in the speech we have already alluded to; that is, its inquisitorial nature. In an inquiry of this kind, too much care cannot be used to avoid being misled by words. Inquisitorial, as applied to a tax, is a term which at present is in bad odour amongst the people of this country, from the circumstance of its having been applied to the income-tax; a tax, which, though on some accounts desirable, was on others deservedly unpopular. The slightest reflection will be sufficient to convince us of the enormous difference between these two imposts, as regards their inquisitorial nature. So long as the income-tax was in existence, every individual was compelled annually to make a disclosure of the amount of his income to certain agents of government; a disclosure which might, in some cases, be productive of bankruptcy or other evil consequences; and, in case of surcharge, his only appeal lay to certain commissioners, appointed by government, who generally resided in his immediate neighbourhood, and who might, therefore, in many cases, be influenced by personal hostility, or by local or political prejudices. The only circumstance of an inquisitorial nature about the window-tax, is that an inspector, appointed by government, has the power of entering all houses twice in the year, at reasonable hours, for the purpose of ascertaining the number of windows; a power, which as far as we can learn, has never been abused, and which we cannot imagine to be productive of much inconvenience. Much less can we agree with Mr. Hobhouse, when he asserts, that "he was not exaggerating, when he said, that a gentleman received * Ante, p. 360.—We have used the term owner, in preference to that of landlord (as we should gladly, when speaking of houses, have substituted another word for rent), in order to avoid confounding the landlords and rents of houses, with the landlords and rents of land; between which persons and things the difference is essential. The landlord of a house is, for the most part, in the situation of a capitalist, and his rent is the profit of stock.

"from the tax-gatherer the paper of assessment with the same dread, that a Pacha received the firman of the Sultan *." Now, if Mr. Hobhouse were really in earnest when he made this declaration, we must conclude, that he attributes the greatest possible degree of mental imbecility, either to the gentlemen of this kingdom, or to the audience which he was then addressing. We would much rather suppose, that he was indulging in a piece of unmeaning parliamentary declamation.

Having thus attempted to shew, that no peculiarly great advantages are likely to result from the repeal of the assessed taxes, we come now to consider the other plan which has been proposed for the employment of our surplus revenue; we mean, a reduction of those duties which are imposed upon our manufactures and commerce. We have already anticipated a great part of what we had to say upon this subject, in our remarks upon equality of taxation. We have there attempted to prove, that it is desirable, that all taxes upon commodities should be reduced, as nearly as circumstances will allow, to an equal ad valorem duty. It is unnecessary for us to enter into details, to shew how far the present system of taxation is removed from this desirable state, as the fact is generally acknowledged. It is obvious, that we cannot arrive at our object, except by a long course of progressive improvement; but we may, nevertheless, make an immediate and important advance towards its attainment, by appropriating the surplus of our revenue, to the reduction of those duties which are most high, and consequently most injurious. We shall thus, according to the principles which we have already laid down, confer a considerable benefit upon the consumer at a small expense, and we shall also diminish as far as possible the temptation to smuggling and adulteration. We shall also, by removing restrictions on our commerce, promote an advantageous intercourse with other countries, an intercourse which is highly desirable from its tendency to diminish national antipathies, and to prevent wars; and we shall at the same time be setting a good example to other nations, which it is to be hoped, they will in time be induced to follow.

We shall not, however, enlarge on this important subject, as it belongs more properly to the department of trade.

There remains to be considered an objection against the reduction of duties on commodities, which we have not yet noticed; which is, that the reduction would be beneficial only to the merchant and manufacturer, and not to the consumer. This argument appears upon the face of it so preposterous, that we should not have hesitated to pass it over without notice, had it not been seriously advanced by Mr. Brougham. That gentleman is reported to have said, that "He thought that it would be much better at once to remove the assessed taxes, than to take away those which pressed indirectly upon the public . . . . Of what use was it to take-off a portion of the tax on any article, when the reduction was met, by a nearly correspondent rise on the part of the venditor?"

We should have thought, that a superficial knowledge of the principles of political economy would have been sufficient to have prevented any person's venturing to assert so untenable a proposition as the one contained in this passage. If it be true, as it was laid down in the Wealth of Nations, and as it has been agreed by all political economists for the last half century, that profits are maintained at the same rate in all employments by competition, it must necessarily follow, that when a tax is reduced, the competition of the merchants, or manufacturers, will cause a corresponding reduction in the price of the commodity, since they would otherwise be enabled to pocket more than the ordinary profits of stock. Indeed, on the same principle, Mr. Brougham ought to maintain, that the tax has in all cases been paid by the producer, and not by the consumer, and that consequently its reduction, instead of being a boon to the former, is nothing more than a tardy and bare act of justice, by which his profits are raised to the same level as those of other trades. It may, indeed, be perfectly true, that duties may on some occasions have been reduced, without any corresponding reduction in the price of the commodity; because other circumstances, with which we are unacquainted, may have operated at the same time, to cause a rise of price: it will, of course, be very easy to find instances of this kind, if we pick out cases in which the reduction has been but small, and where the commodity is subject to considerable fluctuations in price, but it is manifest, that such instances can do nothing to invalidate the general principle. We can also conceive a possible case—though we believe it to be a very rare one, in which the trade might be confined to so small a number of persons, that they might, by combining together, prevent an immediate reduction of price. Such a combination, were it ever practicable, would be necessarily of very short duration; and even this temporary combination might be entirely prevented by a refusal on the part of government, to allow the drawback on the stocks on hand.

Having concluded this part of our subject, it will be seen, that we are disposed to agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as to the propriety of applying the surplus of our revenue to the reduction of our indirect, rather than of our direct taxation; because, on the one hand, we see scarcely any advantage likely to arise from the abolition of the assessed taxes, beyond the mere relief from so much taxation: whilst on the other, we think, that the reduction of some of our enormously high duties will be productive of considerable benefit to the consumer, at small expense to the revenue; will tend to put an end to all the various evils arising from smuggling and adulteration; will promote an advantageous intercourse with other nations, and may be the means of inducing them to follow in our steps. We are glad, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had sufficient firmness to resist the temptation of sacrificing a sound principle to the acquisition of temporary popularity. At the same time, we think he has acted with discretion in abolishing such of the assessed taxes as were productive of a comparatively trifling profit to the revenue, whilst at the same time, they were inconvenient, or vexatious in their operation, difficult, or expensive in collection, or inexpedient from other considerations not necessary to be here enumerated. Such were the house-tax on houses of a rent not exceeding 10*l.* per annum; the window-tax on houses containing not more than seven windows, and the duties on interior windows, taxed carts, poney-carriages, and various other articles, upon which the total loss to the revenue is estimated at 276,000*l.*

Having thus expressed our concurrence in the general principles which have guided the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we must next consider in detail the cases which it has been thought proper to select for a reduction of duty. We shall first consider the arguments which may be urged, for or against a reduction of duty in these particular instances; and we shall then proceed to notice the case of other highly taxed articles, on which the duty remains undiminished. We shall thus be enabled to determine, as far as is in our power, whether the selection of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, or has not been judicious.

We shall begin with coffee. The duties upon this article were previously to the reduction, as follows:—Upon West India coffee, 1*s.* per lb.; East India, 1*s.* 6*d.*; foreign, 2*s.* 6*d.* They have all been reduced one half, by which it is calculated, that the revenue will be diminished to the amount of 150,000*l.* The principal argument in favour of this reduction, has been deduced from the fact that, since the imposition of the last duty, in 1819, the consumption of coffee has not increased in the same proportion as that of other commodities. This argument derives additional force from the fact, that a cheap, wholesome, and not unpalatable substitute for coffee has been lately introduced; the sanction of the legislature having been obtained for the sale of roasted corn, the use of which was, till lately, prohibited by the construction given by the courts to an act of parliament. There was reason, therefore, to apprehend, that unless the price of coffee could be reduced, its use, amongst a large portion of the community, would be entirely superseded by the introduction of this article. The reduction of the duties on coffee has been further recommended on the ground, that it would be particularly desirable at the present moment, as a boon to the West India interest, who are stated to be labouring under great depression. There is also another advantage attending this measure, which we ought not to pass by unnoticed; which is, that it will tend, in some degree, to place our own possessions in the East and West Indies, as well as foreign countries, on a more equal footing in the production of this commodity. West India coffee previously possessed an advantage of 6*d.* per lb. over East India, and of 1*s.* 6*d.* per lb. over foreign coffee: whereas this advantage is now reduced to 3d. in the one case, and to 9d. in the other. We trust that we shall, ere long, see them reduced to a perfect equality. Protecting duties which prevent the consumer from purchasing in the cheapest market, are always injurious; and it surely admits of a doubt whether it can, in any case, be desirable to attempt to benefit one portion of our dominions at the expence of another.

Foreign wines constitute another article which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has selected for a considerable reduction of duty. He has reduced the duty upon French wines from 11s. 5½d. to 6s. per gallon, and upon all other foreign wines from 7s. 7d. to 4s.; and he calculates the consequent loss to the revenue at 230,000l. A very strong argument in favour of the reduction of these duties may be derived from the fact, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "that the consumption of wine in the United Kingdom had not only not increased, but had, in truth, greatly fallen off." Important, however, as may be this consideration, there are, we think, still stronger arguments in favour of this desirable measure. Considerable as may be the immediate benefits to the consumer resulting from the reduction of this duty, they are, in our opinion, as nothing, when compared with the advantages of an unrestricted commercial intercourse between this country and France, towards which, we trust, we may regard the present measure as the first step.

There are, perhaps, no two countries in the world better suited for an advantageous commercial intercourse, as well by their local situation, as by the nature of their productions, than Great Britain and France. They may be considered as the two most civilized nations of the world; they are situated within a few hours' sail of each other; and at the same time the one is distinguished by peculiar advantages, both natural and acquired, for the maintenance of manufactures; whilst the other abounds in all those natural productions, for which the extent of its territory, the fertility of its soil, and the excellence of its climate so eminently qualify it. With these facts staring them in the face, could it have been believed, that the governments of the two countries could have been so ignorant as to go on, year after year, and century after century, obstinately refusing to avail themselves of any of those advantages which nature seems almost to have thrown into their hands? Almost every page of our history contains records of ruinous wars with France; wars which have, in many cases, been undertaken almost without pretence, and have been continued without any ostensible object, except that of gratifying the mutual antipathies of the two countries. Even when mutual exhaustion has caused a temporary interruption of hostilities, our legislature, instead of taking advantage of any favourable opportunity of cultivating social relations between the two countries, has in general done all in its power to prevent communication between them; and thus the two nations have stood, like two ferocious animals, eyeing each other with mutual hatred, and only watching for the first favourable opportunity to renew the conflict. For a confirmation of our statement we would refer to the discussions in parliament, as late as in the year 1787, and above all, to the speeches of Mr. Fox at that period. It was on that occasion that Mr. Pitt proved himself the first minister since the revolution, who had been able to carry through parliament a commercial treaty with France. It was, however, vehemently opposed, and at the head of the opposition stood Mr. Fox. Now since Mr. Fox has been generally esteemed one of the most enlightened statesmen of his time, and since he was regarded as the head of what has been called the more liberal party in the country, we may consider him, on that occasion, to have spoken the sentiments of a large proportion, if not of the majority of the nation. Yet we repeatedly find him using such language as this:—

"France was the natural political enemy of Great Britain. What made her so? Not the memory of Crecy and Agincourt; the victories of those fields had nothing to do with the circumstance. It was the overweening pride and boundless ambition of France; her invariable and ardent desire to hold the sway of Europe*."

And again, "Vicinity of situation, instead of being the means to connect, was what should excite our fear and jealousy†."

We have neither room nor inclination to give a studied refutation of the absurd fallacies contained in these few lines. We shall not, therefore, attempt to shew the folly of the term "natural enemy," nor shall we endeavour to prove how illogical it is to personify the whole changing population of * Fox's Speeches, vol. iii., p. 273.

an extensive country, and then to attribute to this imaginary being all the evil which has been perpetrated by a number of successive administrations. We quote these passages only for the sake of proving how great was the influence of these prejudices even over enlightened minds, and at so late a period; and we may perhaps be allowed at the same time to congratulate ourselves, that in this respect, at least, our generation has improved on that of our forefathers. We trust, indeed, that the present inhabitants of this country, have tasted sufficiently of the evils of war; and that they have learned, that it is injurious, not only by the immediate loss and misery which it occasions, but also by its tendency to turn aside the attention both of the Government and of the public, from the reformation of their institutions, and from all other subjects of useful inquiry. We trust that it is needless to caution the people both of this country and of France, to beware for the future, as they value their own happiness and that of their posterity, how they suffer themselves to be misled by the empty sound of military glory. As a first step towards an entire change of ancient feelings, it would be well for the Governments of both countries to do all in their power to promote commercial intercourse between them; much less for the sake of the immediate advantages of the trade, than for the purpose of promoting such a free communication as must gradually remove those disgraceful prejudices, which have been so long injurious to both parties: and because, by thus rendering the two nations dependent upon each other for many of the comforts and luxuries of life, they will make the evils of war more directly and sensibly felt, and consequently a commencement of hostilities, more unpopular, amongst all classes of society. It is, therefore, with the greatest satisfaction, that we hail the reduction of a high duty on an article of French production, as we trust that it is intended only as the first step towards an entire change of system. Our readers will remark, that French wines still remain subject to a duty of 50 per cent. higher than that which is imposed upon the wines of Portugal or other countries; and that such inequality is utterly inconsistent with the principles which we have endeavoured to advocate. This inequality was originally caused by the Methuen treaty, which was concluded with Portugal so long ago as the year 1703, and according to the provisions of which, we agreed to receive Portuguese wines at a lower duty than those of France, on condition of Portugal's receiving the productions of our woollen manufacture on favourable terms in return. It is unnecessary to prove that such a treaty must be injurious to both parties, inasmuch as it restricts them from having recourse to the cheapest market. It has, nevertheless, been persevered in for upwards of 120 years. According to one of the stipulations, however, a power was reserved to either party, of requiring a revision of the treaty, by giving a notice of 15 years. At the conclusion of the treaty of 1810, such notice is understood to have been given; and we trust, therefore, that our Government will now avail themselves of the opportunity which is thus afforded them, of equalizing the duties upon all foreign wines, as well as abolishing the monopoly of the Oporto Wine Company; a monopoly which is said to have considerably enhanced the prices of Portuguese wines, by limiting the supply.

There is an objection which might be urged, with considerable plausibility, against a reduction of duty on French wines; viz. that the first-rate claret-vineyards are small in extent, and that, consequently, their produce fetches a monopoly price; and that if, therefore, we reduce the duty, we shall not benefit the consumer, but shall only increase the rent of the French landlord. Now we certainly cannot undertake to assert, that this statement may not be true to a certain extent, with regard to a few of the very first-rate wines. But it appears, that not an hundredth part of the wine which is sold under the names of Lafitte and Chateau Margaux is really produced from those vineyards, and that therefore the monopoly, if it exist at all, is at all events not nearly of the extent which is generally supposed. We may add, that the reduction of duty will, in all probability, have the effect of greatly increasing the consumption of the inferior kinds of French wines, which have hitherto been altogether unknown in this country.

Whilst we are upon the subject of the prices of wine, we would mention, that it would be highly desirable that an ad valorem duty should, if it were practicable, be substituted for the present fixed duty per gallon. We have already said enough upon the disadvantages of inequality of taxation, in the early part of this essay; it is therefore only necessary to add, that by the present mode of collection, the duty increases in but a very small proportion the price of the more expensive wines, whilst it has the effect of entirely excluding the inferior sorts from the British market; and we need scarcely state, that if tolerably good wine could be purchased at one or two shillings a bottle, the consumption would, in all probability, be equally increased, and a considerable addition would be made to the luxuries of a large class of the community. Without an acquaintance with the practical details of taxation, it would of course be presumptuous to give a decided opinion as to the practicability of imposing an ad valorem duty upon this article. Since, however, we believe that it is at present usual to taste all wines which pass through the Custom-house, in order to ascertain that they are really the produce of the country from which they profess to be imported, we would ask, whether a plan might not be adopted with regard to wine, similar to that which is at present practised in the case of certain other articles which pay an ad valorem duty; that is, that a taster should be employed on the part of Government, that the importer should be required to fix a value upon the wine, and that Government should have the option either of receiving the ad valorem duty, or of purchasing the wine at this valuation.

Before concluding our observations on the wine duties, we must advert to what we consider a very unwarranted attack which has been made upon the wine-merchants, both by Mr. Brougham and by Mr. Huskisson. Mr. Brougham stated in the House of Commons, that "On the morning following the night on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had announced his intention of taking off 20l. per hogshead from the duties on French claret, he heard that the honest class of his Majesty's subjects, who were employed in selling wine to the rest of his Majesty's subjects, had raised the price of the same wine 10l. per hogshead."

And on the same night Mr. Huskisson stated, that "He had heard, with considerable indignation (hear, hear), that the wine-merchants had, some how or other, managed, within these few days, to double their stocks, and to raise the price in a ratio about equal to the amount of the reduction of duty (hear, hear) &c."

We were astonished to hear such sentiments from Mr. Huskisson, as they appear to be altogether opposed to the principles which he usually professes. The price of wine, like that of all other commodities, is determined by circumstances altogether independent of the merchants; and it is both useless and unjust to blame them for obtaining the highest possible price in their power. The fact, on this occasion, appears to have been, that the report of the reduction of the duty produced in the first instance so great an increase in the demand, as to enable the wine-merchants to raise their prices, instead of reducing them; but it was obvious that this rise could only be of very temporary duration, because the increased demand having been caused solely by the hope of a reduction in price, when it was discovered that the price, instead of being reduced, had risen, the demand would of course be checked and subsequently diminished. And thus it was found, as might have been predicted, that the evil corrected itself, and that prices fell to their proper level.

There has been some discussion in the House of Commons, during the last session, as to the propriety of reducing the duties upon Cape wines. It has been urged with some force by Mr. Hume, that since the duties upon Cape wines have hitherto been only one-third of those upon Portuguese, and since considerable capital has been invested in their cultivation, in the confident expectation of a continuance of the protection, the Cape cultivator would be unjustly treated, if no corresponding reduction were granted to him. It has been maintained, on the other side, that no actual promise has ever been made, and that all protections of this kind are inconsistent with the principles on which Government is at present acting. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has steered a middle course; he has granted a reduction of duty upon Cape wines, from 2s. 6d. to 2s. per gallon, such reduction to continue till the year 1830. The question was one of considerable difficulty, and we knew not that a better plan could have been adopted. We have in this instance only another proof, that it is not one of the least evils of deviating from the true path of equality of taxation, that we can seldom return to it without doing injury to some existing interest.

The article upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has afforded the greatest reduction of taxation is that of spirits; as he calculates that the loss to the revenue arising from the diminution of duty will amount to no less a sum than 750,000*l*. The enormous evils that were caused by the smuggling of spirits and by illicit distillation, especially in Ireland, are too well known to require any enumeration in this place. Accordingly, in the preceding session of parliament, it was determined to make a reduction of duty upon Scotch and Irish spirits, from 5*s*. 6*d*. to 2*s*. per gallon, and this reduction has been attended by the happiest effects. Now it was obviously absurd, when the duty was only 2*s*. in Scotland and Ireland, to retain it at the high rate of 10*s*. 6*d*. in England; and, accordingly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has determined to reduce it in the first instance to 5*s*. 10*d*.; and also to throw the trade more open, by allowing the use of smaller stills than were permitted heretofore, and by removing certain other restrictions on the manufacture.

We have heard of no objections against this desirable measure, except one which has been advanced by Mr. Wm. Smith; which is, that the reduction of the duty on spirits would, by diminishing the price, tend to encourage the vice of drunkenness amongst the lower orders. To this it has been replied by Mr. Hume, that in France, Holland, and the United States of America, where spirits are cheap, drunkenness is comparatively unknown. We might add, that, even if we allow the force of Mr. Smith's argument to its fullest extent, we should still be of opinion that the encouragement which high duties afford to smuggling is far more injurious to the morals of the people, than the effect of low duties in rendering the means of intoxication cheaper: we cannot, moreover, but believe, that the only effectual mode of promoting morality is by the diffusion of knowledge, and that those persons take a very narrow view of the subject who would enforce its practice by sumptuary laws or compulsory enactments.

The cider duties have been reduced from 30*s*. per hogshead to 10*s*. This reduction is highly desirable, inasmuch as cider is the liquor ordinarily drunk by the population of six counties, throughout which it is notorious that smuggling has been carried on to a considerable extent. The loss to the revenue is estimated at only 20,000*l*.

Having now examined separately the case of each of those articles which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has selected for a reduction of duty, we must, in the next place, notice certain other highly taxed commodities, in respect to which, according to many speakers, the claims should have been considered as more urgent. The principal of these are tobacco, soap and candles, and tea. It is stated by Mr. Hart Davis, that the duty on tobacco is not less than 1200 per cent. upon its original value, and that the revenue derived from it had not increased as it ought to have done. There appears to be no doubt that this high duty has been the cause that the consumption of tobacco in this country is so much less than on the continent. The duty upon soap and candles amounts to 120 per cent., and it is stated by Mr. Sykes, the member for Hull, that there is great reason to suppose that the articles, or their raw materials, are the objects of extensive smuggling. The duty upon tea is nominally 100 per cent.; but, in fact, it is much more. The East India Company possess an entire monopoly of this article, and it is found by a comparison of the prices at which tea has been sold at their sales in London, and those at which it may be purchased on the continent, that the people of this country pay, as consumers of tea, a tax of upwards of two millions annually for the sole profit of the East India Company*; and since the ad valorem duty to Government is charged upon the price so increased by this tax, it is obvious that it is in reality much more than 100 per cent. There is every reason to suppose that much smuggling must be caused by so high a duty, and we know from the repeated convictions, that the adulteration of tea has been carried on to a very great extent.

Now it is manifest, that so long as any commodities are taxed to such a high degree as in the instances which we have given, the prevention of smuggling must be impossible, and the exertions, both of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and of the President of the Board of Trade, towards this desirable end, must be attended with but imperfect success. At the same time we admit, that it is not possible to do every thing at once, and we will not undertake to assert that the best selection has not been made, although the cases of coffee and hemp (concerning which we have not entered into any minute examination) would certainly appear to be less urgent than those which we have mentioned. When taxation is so enormously high, as in the case of tobacco, a beginning might certainly be made with little or no loss to the revenue; and we cannot understand the reasoning of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he asserts, that to reduce the duties on this article to a less amount than 50 per cent. would afford no benefit to the consumer*. The benefit to the consumer would be at least proportionate to the amount of duties reduced.

A motion for the repeal of the beer duties was made in the course of the session by Mr. Maberly. It appears that the consumption of beer has increased but very little for the last century, whence we may conclude, either that the duty must be too high, or that there must be something peculiarly disadvantageous in the mode of its collection. The late reduction of the duty on spirits also forms an additional argument in favour of the abolition of the beer duties. But it is not so much of their absolute amount that we complain, as of their unequal pressure on the different classes of the community. The fact is, that there exists a tax to the amount of 20s. a quarter on malt, and another tax of 35s. upon beer; so that, in truth, the rich man, who possesses the means of brewing his own beer, contributes only 20s. towards the revenue, whilst the poor man, who is obliged to purchase his beer at a public-house, pays 55s. Such a mode of taxation is, at any rate, unjust; and we can see no reason why the whole of the duty might not be imposed upon the malt. Nor can we understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he asserts, that if this were done "the consumer, although "he would have the satisfaction of paying more, would himself pay nothing "less &c." It may be true, that the relief to the poorer classes might not be so great as is supposed; but surely all that would be lost by the one class must necessarily be gained by the other.

There remains an observation, with respect to a certain class of commodities, to which we trust that the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be called. It is often usual to impose a duty upon the manufacture, and afterwards to return this duty on exportation, under the name of a drawback. Now there are some articles of which a considerable proportion of the whole amount are intended for exportation, and it is manifest, that in this case a considerable loss is occasioned, not only by the expense of first collecting, and afterwards refunding the duties, but also by a larger amount of capital being thus required, in order to carry on the business. This is the case with printed goods, on which not less than two-thirds of the duties received are returned in the shape of a drawback.

In concluding our observations we will repeat, that we are disposed to give Mr. Robinson full credit for the change of system which he has introduced, and for the sound principles which have in general guided his conduct. We are not amongst those, who (to use his own expression) would ride a willing horse to death, or who, because every thing is not accomplished which they might have hoped for, would pass over without commendation, the improvements which have indisputably been effected in our financial system. But at the same time we would warn him, that much yet remains to be done, and that until he has applied his principles more universally, many of his measures will be attended with only partial success, his motives will be liable to misrepresentation, and his conduct will be subject to the charge of inconsistency. We trust, therefore, that he will proceed firmly, but cautiously, with the good work which he has before him, and that he will thus acquire not a mere temporary popularity, but a permanent and honourable reputation, founded upon the merit of having been the first to reduce to practice those sound principles which are the only secure basis of national prosperity.

II. HAVING investigated, in the preceding section, the best means of raising a revenue for the purposes of government, we propose, in the remainder of this essay, to examine the propriety of imposing those duties for the protection of manufactures and the benefit of trade, which form so conspicuous a feature in our commercial regulations. The various branches of political economy, in spite of the analytical nature of the science, are so interwoven with each other, that no single part can be understood without a previous knowledge of the whole. This peculiarity, which constitutes the great difficulty of discussing any separate division of the science, without obscurity or diffuseness, will oblige us, for the sake of avoiding both these faults, to refer to some of our previous reasonings, connected with the present question.

The principal questions to be considered, with a view, not only to Mr. Huskisson's measures of last session, but to the adoption of a system of unrestricted trade, are two: 1. The means of facilitating the importation of such foreign commodities, as have been hitherto produced at home, under the protection of restrictive or prohibitory duties: and, 2. The means of discouraging the production of such domestic articles, as have been hitherto produced, either for home consumption or exportation, under the protection of bounties, privileges, &c.

In our remarks on the Colonial Trade bill, we have analysed, at some length, the effect of importation duties*. We contended, that a partial admission of foreign commodities into any country cannot be effected by such means; and that where greater facilities for production exist abroad, importation duties can never act as a medium between the prohibition of a foreign, and the destruction of a home branch of manufacture. Though this be strictly true in the case of manufactures, in which there exists no inequality in the facilities of production—in which, unless a man can afford to produce at a given cost, he cannot afford to produce at all;—the proposition admits of qualification in respect to those commodities which yield a rent. Thus, it is well known, that the free admission of corn would only throw out of cultivation the land yielding the least return, and diminish to that extent the amount of rent paid on the superior soils. Mines also, inasmuch as they are unequally productive, are in the same situation as land: it is the increased demand that forces a recurrence to inferior mines, and creates a rent in those of superior productiveness. In truth, there is no difference between the phenomena which attend the working of mines and the cultivation of land, except that the produce of the latter being indispensable, the universal rate of profit is regulated by the cost of growing corn on the least fertile soil, and not by the cost of raising ore from the least productive mine.

An attention to the different effects produced by importation duties on those articles, which may be said, by a phrase not strictly accurate, to yield a rent, and those of which the price is wholly compounded of wages and profits, is peculiarly necessary in the present instance, not only to understand the causes of the different operations which we think likely to ensue in some of Mr. Huskisson's measures, but also to acquire just ideas upon the mode of protecting home manufactures and the ultimate emancipation of trade. On this principle we cannot but approve of the admission of foreign iron, copper, and tin, under a duty, which really protects the mass of home producers and owners of British mines, precisely as a duty on foreign corn would protect the British farmer and landlord.

In the instance we allude to the remedy adopted is at once simple and rapid; a gradual diminution of the duty will gradually remove the evil, whilst it injures few, ruins none, and benefits many. We must not omit to mention that the short debate on this subject presents the agreeable instance of one of the most extensive iron masters (Mr. Alderman Thompson) defending a measure, productive of at least some temporary injury to himself; an act, however, as little appreciated as it is rare†. In the present instance, at least, it was unaccompanied by any similar example. Nay, it did not prevent Sir H. Vivian from contending that the importation of South American copper, would destroy the value of the Cornish mines‡: an argument, which, to say nothing of its inaccuracy as to the fact, is only admissible on the supposition, that the productiveness of all those mines is exactly the same, and that the least valuable of the mines now wrought in South America is more productive than the richest in Cornwall.

† Ante, p. 356.

‡ See ante, p. 373.

a diminished facility of producing it—a rise in price which is always followed by a rise in rent—if the foreign commodity of the same kind be excluded, or burdened with a high duty, a gradual reduction of the duty, whilst it removes the evil, alleviates, if it does not prevent the injury attendant on a sudden repeal of the restriction; as it throws but a small part of the class engaged in producing the commodity out of employment at every successive step in the reduction of the importation duty, and dislodges or impairs but a small portion of capital. But with manufacturers, the difficulty is greater. A diminution of importation duty on a foreign article, however gradual, will not, as we have already seen*, produce any effect at all, without destroying the domestic manufacture. The means, then, by which this evil may be prevented, or at least in a great measure diminished, is the great desideratum; and although it is not without diffidence that we hazard a suggestion, we think it right to state our opinion; especially as we are fully assured of the fallaciousness of Mr. Huskisson's plan of protecting duties on importation.

If a commodity of home production must be sold at a certain price, in order that the producer may realize the usual rate of profit; we say, that the admission of the same commodity from abroad under any duty (it matters not how great) which should enable the foreign to undersell the British dealer, would have the effect of driving the latter from the market. If the duty were so high as to prevent the foreign from selling at a less price than the British dealer, the foreign dealer would have no motive for entering the market at all; and such a duty would be tantamount to a prohibition: but if the duty would allow him to undersell, then, as there cannot be two prices in the same market, and as his prices would and must be lower, there would be nothing to prevent him from furnishing the whole supply and depriving the British dealer of his custom.

The supposition upon which importation duties have been imposed, seems to be, that they would limit the foreign supply. That, in fact, is precisely what is wanted, although it will not be effected by importation duties. It would, however, be effected by fixing the quantity, in which the imported article should be allowed to enter the British market.

The effect of a partial admission of a foreign commodity on prices in the British market, whatever might be the difference in the comparative costs of production, at home and abroad, would depend entirely upon the quantity of the article admitted. For instance, suppose the home demand for silk to require a supply of 10,000 pieces a-year, which the home producer could not afford to bring into the market at a lower price than 60s. per piece; if a small quantity, for instance 500 pieces, of silk were admitted from a foreign country, where the cost of production was lower than at home, the effect would be a general fall in the price of the commodity: there would be a supply of, or the power of supplying 12,500 pieces, and a demand only for 10,000†. The fall in price would displace so much capital at home as might be necessary for the production of 500 pieces of silk; but as soon as that capital should be displaced, and the supply restored to its former level, prices would also rise to their former rate, and 500 pieces of silk might thenceforth be constantly imported every year without producing any further effect on prices. By this operation a twentieth part of the capital would be turned over to more productive employments, at a comparatively small loss to the owner, and, of course, none to the public. In the course of time 500 additional pieces of foreign silk might be let in with a similar effect, and by further repetitions of this operation—by a gradual increase of the quantity imported, and a corresponding decrease of the quantity produced at home, the transfer of the whole capital employed in the domestic manufacture, might be effected without ruin to its employer or injury to the labourer by the sudden change which attends an unlimited importation.

It may be urged, that as the supply furnished by the home producer was adequate to the demand, the supply from abroad, however limited in quantity, would produce a glut, and thereby depress the price of silk as much as an unlimited admission of foreign produce, under an importation duty: the cases, however, are distinct; a glut is but temporary, and the removal of a small portion of capital would speedily raise the price of the article to its former level, since the foreign supply alone would be inadequate to meet the demand. Not so in the case of the unlimited admission of foreign silk; the transfer of the whole capital embarked in the home manufacture would not alter the price, which in that case would be regulated by the cost of production to the foreign trader, as in the former case by the cost of production to the home producer.

* See ante, p. 634.

Beneficial effects also might be anticipated from the foreknowledge of such admission; which, as it would suggest the probable occurrence of the glut, would induce all persons, having favourable opportunities, to transfer their capital; leaving to those who were either unable or unwilling to withdraw from their business, an unaltered price and undiminished profits; while, on the other hand, a foreknowledge of the unlimited admission of foreign silk, subject to a duty, would be of no avail: since it would induce all to transfer their capital as speedily as possible, and would be followed by nearly the same effect as the actual appearance of the article in the market. Add to this, that, in the case of an admission limited in quantity, the Government, having the power of regulating the admission, might assist the producer or consumer, according to the exigency of the case, by lessening or increasing its amount at their own discretion; in which respect, the market-price of silk would afford a perfect guide. We trust we have said enough to shew the beneficial results of a limitation in the quantity of imports, as compared with an importation duty. The object might be attained by the warehousing system, from which so much benefit has been derived to our restricted trade; precisely as in the case of foreign corn, of which, when the price is lowered by a sudden influx, the surplus is warehoused, in a manner too well known to need any description here.

It may be considered as a further recommendation of the plan for limiting the quantity of those imports in which a perfectly free trade would be immediately ruinous to the home producer, that such imports might be charged with a duty, during the time of their limited admission, which would be wholly free from the usual objections to custom-house duties. In fact, it would be free from all objection: such a duty would emulate, in some degree, the perfection of a seignorage, of which no one feels the burthen; since, though the consumer really paid it in the increased price of the article, that price would be kept up for the greater interest of the home producer. This case, then, forms an exception to what we hold to be a general principle; viz. that taxes, for purposes of revenue, whatever be their amount, should be what are called direct, and levied on every individual in proportion, as near as might be, to his income.

Such, then, we conceive to be the safe and proper mode of introducing a system of free trade with regard to those domestic articles which have heretofore been guarded by prohibitory duties from the competition of the foreign dealer. We shall not enter, in this place, into a detailed consideration of the cases selected by Mr. Huskisson, as the subjects of his act of last session; which, indeed (with the exception of the metals, and those we have already noticed), present but little matter for remark. We have been more anxious to expound the principle upon which all such changes should be made; than to criticise the particular instances comprised in Mr. Huskisson's measures of last session.

Passing over, therefore, the articles of greater importance, of which we fully approve the selection, whatever we may think of the plan upon which the reform is conducted; we may remark, that with regard to many other articles of less importance, Mr. Huskisson seems to have pursued a very judicious course.

Such has been the extravagant jealousy of the British manufacturers, and the ignorance of the legislature, that it is difficult to name any article of foreign production which has not been set down in the book of rates, and charged with an importation duty. For greater certainty, and to avoid the possibility of danger from the untaxed admission of any species of foreign manufactured produce, there was "a sweeping clause at the end of that book," which provided that all goods, wares, and merchandize, either in part or wholly manufactured, which should not have been enumerated in the book of rates, should pay an importation duty of 50L. per cent. on their estimated value; and by a further clause, a duty of 20L. per cent. was imposed upon all non-enumerated articles which were manufactured neither wholly nor in part. With respect to these articles, Mr. Huskisson said, that "He proposed to reduce the duty on manufactured articles, not enumerated, from 50l. to 20l. and on articles unmanufactured, from 20l. to 10l. per cent. The result of these alterations would be, that upon foreign manufactured articles generally, where the duty was imposed to protect our own manufactures, and not for the purpose of collecting revenue, that duty would, in no instance, exceed 30l. per cent. If the article were not manufactured much cheaper or much better abroad than at home, such a duty was ample for protection. If it were manufactured so much cheaper, or so much better abroad, as to render 30l. per cent. insufficient, his answer was, first—that a greater protection was only a premium to the smuggler; and, secondly, that there was no wisdom in attempting to bolster up a competition, which this degree of protection would not sustain. Let the state have the tax, which was now the reward of the smuggler, and let the consumer have the better and cheaper article, without the painful consciousness that he was consulting his own convenience at the expense of daily violating the laws of his country" (ante, p. 368).

There can be no doubt that, in cases like these, the duty should be wholly removed. In almost all such cases, the protection to any home manufacture is merely imaginary, and the duty is nearly unproductive for the purpose of revenue. Its only effect is to render the custom-house accounts more complex, and to generate a race of smugglers.

But these are not the only instances in which our custom laws bear marks of having been framed by persons wholly ignorant of the principles of trade. While the principal revenue is received from scarcely 20 articles, the list of enumerated commodities, which pay duties, occupies the space of 34 folio pages*. Of so copious a catalogue it is evident that the greater part cannot be in very great request; and thus the Government enhances the price of such commodities to the small class of their consumers, not to mention the delay, vexation, and loss, which must frequently attend the collection of such duties.

Thus, for instance, there are duties on

We have here selected a few of the most glaring instances; but, were we to particularize all, it would be necessary to copy four-fifths of the whole table. Were all duties abolished on commodities yielding a revenue under 100,000l., the finances of the state would be but slightly impaired, while the convenience to trade and the advantage to the consumers would more than repay the sacrifice.

We shall now proceed to consider the second of the two questions with which we commenced this section;—the question regarding Bounties.

As the system of Bounties is founded on the assumption that certain peculiar branches of industry are more beneficial to the country than certain others, it will be useful to point out, in a few words, the fallaciousness of that opinion. Without insisting further on a subject that admits of elaborate proof, it may be shortly stated, that every permanent increase of population is preceded by an increase in the capital of the country. The rapid progress of population in all new countries, and wherever capital augments rapidly, is a proof that to whatever extent the accumulation of capital may produce a demand for labour, to that extent a supply of labourers will speedily appear. The danger is all on one side: the only danger to be apprehended is from the too rapid increase of people as compared with the permanent demand for labour, and the consequent suffering and degradation which must ensue to the labouring class from a diminution of wages. The community, then, is only benefitted by a constant augmentation of capital, which can solely arise from savings out of the profits of capital.

This augmentation will be most rapid when profits are highest; that trade, therefore, which is most profitable to the individual, is most beneficial to the country; and the greatest advantage that can befall a nation, is a permanent rise in the average profits of stock. Now, as encouragement to any particular trade cannot influence the general rate of profits, it can in no wise tend to produce the only result from which the people receive real benefit. A bounty is the converse of a tax, and, consequently, as it lessens the cost of production, it diminishes price to the amount of the bounty paid; but, as the bounty itself must be raised by taxation, the price of the articles on which it is levied must be raised to the same extent, as the commodity, on which the bounty is paid, will be depressed: for competition will not allow either the profits on one to be below, or on the other to be above the average level. Thus, if a tax of 100,000*l.* were annually levied upon shoes, and paid as a bounty upon the production of stockings, the price of shoes would rise in proportion to the fall in stockings; and no one would be able to clothe his legs a whit the cheaper: on the contrary, the expence would be rather increased, for, as the tax cannot be raised without expence, the bounty paid must fall short of the tax levied; and the difference would be so much lost to the consumers of shoes and stockings. As what is paid must have been received, whatever is gained by one party is lost by another: if more stockings and fewer shoes are consumed, either the bounty must be diminished, or the tax increased, or transferred to some other commodity; and the community would neither gain nor lose.

It is not our intention, nor is it within the scope of our discussion, to trace the various and interesting effects produced upon wages and profits, according as the bounty is paid, or the tax levied upon commodities which are principally consumed by labourers or capitalists. It is sufficient for us to shew that it cannot benefit any class, without equally prejudicing another; and that the mass of the production of the country remains unchanged: still, however, as it alters existing relations, as it may cause a transfer of capital and some consequent loss, and as it causes an expenditure, however slight, without return, it is accompanied by some evil. Such are the results of bounties paid on production. But bounties on exportation have a very different and worse effect, though by the operation of the same principles. Such bounties tend to lower the price of the article on which they are bestowed, not for the home, but for the foreign consumer. If Great Britain paid a bounty of 3 per cent. above the cost of carriage, on the exportation of a commodity to France, for the production of which each country possessed the same advantages, the latter deriving her supplies from the former, would withdraw her capital from this employment, to which the capital of Great Britain would be attracted. The demands, however, of the domestic consumer would remain unaltered, and must be met by imports from abroad, for which payment would be made in the commodity encouraged by the bounty. The French capital withdrawn from the production of this very commodity, would either directly, or through the intervention of some other country, supply the unsatisfied demands of the domestic consumer, by which process an additional 3 per cent. would be gained on that capital; while at home the sole result would be to increase the quantity produced of the encouraged article, without altering the cost of production. The foreign consumer would save the bounty for the purchase of other commodities, or the accumulation of capital; while the home consumer, forced to pay dearer for some articles, and cheaper for none, would suffer under a needlessly limited command over the objects of desire, and a diminished power of accumulation.

What is true of bounties is equally true of drawbacks; though the latter may bear an appearance of justice, and the former of favour, the effects are the same. Drawbacks are but equivalents on exportation for duties on importation, and in no wise affect the price in the home market, which is determined by the cost of production. In excised articles, where the duty levied in one stage of production, is partially returned in a succeeding stage, it is immaterial to the consumer whether this surplus be levied and repaid, or altogether omitted.

As bounties and restrictive duties correspond in their operation, so are they to be removed by similar remedies. The first step of a gradual diminution of a bounty, would destroy the foreign demand; while the fixing a decreasing limit to the quantity, on which the bounty should be paid, would gently and effectually remove the evil, by the operation we have already traced, when describing the effect of an increasing limited admission of foreign goods, on the home producer. Fortunately the actual evil is less in the case of bounties, than in that of restrictive duties, as the principle is little acted on; still, however, as upwards of one million is annually paid in the shape of drawbacks on the customs alone*, and more than two millions on the excise†, beside bounties on sail-cloth, cordage, linens, and sugar, it is by no means so slight an evil as to be unworthy of attention. If the necessities of government require a revenue, let it be raised; but let not unnecessary sums be exacted, for the purpose of either altering the due relations in the production of commodities at home, or to enable other countries to buy them, at less than their natural price.

What was done with regard to bounties in the last session, is too trivial to need remark; we have mentioned the subject, rather with an eye to what may be done hereafter, than what has been attempted hitherto.

As the increase of capital is, or more properly ought to be, the great end of commercial regulations, one of the main objects which should never be lost sight of by the legislator, in altering or framing such regulations, is to avoid as much as possible, that partial destruction of capital, which almost necessarily attends its transfer. The destruction of capital is one of the few necessary evils that occur, even under the most perfect system. A demand for the necessities of life, as they are indispensable, admits of little fluctuation; but the constant variation in the taste for luxuries, and the uniform progression of human skill, unite unavoidable evils with the most beneficial effects; and the fashion of a day, or the alteration of a wheel, may render large masses of capital useless, and the skill of the labourer unavailing. These necessary losses, attendant on the whims and improvements of the world, are but slight, when compared with the evils which arise from the fatal propensities of those who govern mankind. The commencement, or close of a single war, produces more extensive injury, from the loss of capital, consequent upon the alterations in the channels of trade, than the mechanical improvements of a century, without their ulterior advantages; and the taxes of government, as transitory and whimsical in their nature, but of more extensive operation than the fashions of ages, render great portions of capital valueless, and by disturbing the natural relations of commerce, lay the foundation of still greater losses to come.

The time, however, we may hope, is not far distant, when the artificial impediments, opposed by mistaken legislation, to the natural courses of industry, which are, with scarcely an exception, the most profitable, will be at last removed. It has been our endeavour to point out the way in which they may be removed, with the least immediate loss. If the sole object be free trade, that may be best attained by repealing all duties, whose abolition would cause no change in the direction of industry, and withdrawing, by a gradual operation, the capital of the country engaged in constrained employments. If the object combine revenue with the ultimate emancipation of commerce—as it must do, at least for a long time, in a country overloaded with taxes, like Great Britain, recourse must still be had to the same mild but efficient remedy. While emancipating fettered industry, revenue should be obtained from such duties, as are not followed by a forced and unnatural distribution of national capital; so that, when the revenue ceases to be necessary, or is derivable from other sources, the immediate removal of the duties may confer a permanent benefit on the community, unattended by individual suffering. In either case, the ultimate object should be the entire removal of commercial impediments; that the productions of every corner of the globe, may be distributed according to the wants and desires of nations, and not according to the caprice of Ministers of Finance, and the rules of the book of rates.

At present our commerce is far removed from this desirable state. The old † Finance Accounts for the year ending January 1825, p. 68.—It is true, however, that in the excise the principal part of the sum is merely repaid to the person who paid the tax at an earlier period.—What are the several amounts it is scarcely possible to ascertain: of course our arguments only apply to the residue.

principle, which ascribed the benefits of trade to a surplus of exports over imports, supposed to be paid in money, as it produced, still pervades our commercial system. This fallacious doctrine, which nearly every writer from Locke to Adam Smith, has successively exposed, and to which the increase of the capital of this country to the extent of many millions, while the currency has only increased by some thousands, has added so effectual a refutation, retained its place in all the measures of government, from its open recognition by the Methuen treaty, down to its virtual rejection by the colonial bill of the present Government. Almost without our own recollection, we find Mr. Fox avowing a theory, which supposes a perfect ignorance of the common principles in a science, without a knowledge of which, a man may become the successful leader of a faction, but will never be fit for a legislator. In his speech on the commercial treaty with France (Feb. 12, 1787), Mr. Fox observed, that,

"With respect to the equivalent, which we were to have for the reduction of the duties on French wines, so as to admit them more freely into our ports, what article had we the privilege of exporting into France? He knew of none. It appeared to him, therefore, an advantage given to France, without the least sign of an equivalent."

We must not, however, impute too much superiority to the present House of Commons, over that of 1787, because we have a Chancellor of the Exchequer and a President of the Board of Trade, who have at last acquired more enlarged ideas, and adopted a more liberal practice than their predecessors. The majority of the house, and, what is worse, a large body of the merchants out of doors, still adhere to the principle of Mr. Fox. In his speech on Foreign Trade, Mr. Huskisson observed, that,

"He expected a further objection—indeed he had already been told, in the correspondence which he had felt it right to hold with some of our most intelligent and accomplished merchants and manufacturers, on this subject—that in 1786, we had insured from France, by treaty, a reciprocity of commercial advantages; but that, at present, we had made no such arrangement*."

Be it remarked, that we have already had occasion to animadvert upon this very fallacy—and a most absurd one it is—from the lips of Mr. Huskisson himself.

As a further proof of Mr. Huskisson's remark, we may observe that, whenever the members of the House of Commons represent anything "but their own pockets," as one of them facetiously terms it; whenever their language in the house is influenced by the opinions of their constituents—we uniformly find them emitting the most unwholesome notions on the subject of trade.

Thus the member for Truro is alarmed at the introduction of foreign copper†: the member for Staffordshire demands protection for crockery§: the member for Rippon considers that woollen goods are neglected||: the member for Bristol demands attention to the West India trade¶: the member for Newcastle complains of the duty on Northumberland coals**; and the members for Westminster, London, and Bristol††, declaim long and loudly against assessed taxes. All, however, as if desirous of delivering themselves from the imputation of downright imbecility, agree in praising the general tendency of Mr. Huskisson's measures.

This language will, of course, continue till the people become more instructed. In the mean time, it is fortunate for the country, that what, in this instance, public opinion is not sufficiently enlightened to effect, is likely to be in part, at least, accomplished by the enlarged views and liberal ambition of individuals. It is to ministers like the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the President of the Board of Trade, that we may look for the final renunciation of the principles of the mercantile school of commerce. Their continued exertions cannot fail to produce a beneficial change, not only in our commercial policy, but in the state of public opinion. In the debates which have taken place upon the propositions they have severally brought forward during the last two or three sessions of parliament, the speeches of those gentlemen have formed, both as to the matter conveyed, and the mode of conveying it, a striking contrast with the ordinary style of House of Commons' oratory. The prepared speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are models of the useful style. If his practice continue worthy of his speeches, we shall not despair of the consummation we have long desired, when the ignorance and the rhetoric of the brilliant talkers of the last century will give place to solid information and a sober style of delivery; a consummation which will convert the House of Commons from a debating club, into a place for the sober transaction of public business.

Navigation Laws.

AMONGST the numerous objections adduced against the recent propositions for establishing an open trade with our colonies and foreign countries, there is one, which from its extent and speciousness seems to call for some notice here, although but little prominent in the debates; we mean, the Navigation Laws. Our remarks, however, will rather be proportioned to the space which that subject occupied in parliament, than to its actual importance: and we shall rather touch upon it for the purpose of pointing out the insufficiency of the reasons alledged in defence of the Navigation Laws as an objection to a free trade, than handle it with any view to expound a system of our own.

Putting aside all other evil consequences of the new commercial system; its evil consequence to our navy, and thence to the security of our shores, by undermining our most effectual means of defensive warfare, is alleged to be conclusive against its adoption.

Other objections are, for the most part, of a partial nature; being drawn only from particular evils, and applying to particular measures. But this objection overrides the whole subject, and is only satisfied by a total rejection of the principles of free trade.

The proposition is simply this.—The essential defence of the country, in time of war, is the navy: The efficiency of the navy depends on the supply of efficient sailors; for the furnishing of which, we must depend on the merchant service. The admission of foreign vessels to a participation of the carrying trade, by limiting the demand for merchant shipping, has a tendency to destroy the sources which supply our naval marine; whence it follows, that a system of free trade (from which a competition between the merchant service of foreign countries and our own must unavoidably spring up) is incompatible with the safety of the empire in time of war.

This reasoning, if correct, is undoubtedly worthy of consideration, although it would not, we think, be found conclusive. As we do not propose at present, to inquire into the state of our naval establishment—an inquiry which we reserve for another time; we shall confine ourselves to the two leading topics which the foregoing statement suggests.

First, then, we deny that part of the premises, by which it is assumed that the competition of the shipping of foreign nations would narrow the employment of our own. Undoubtedly the effect of a free intercourse with foreign countries, by increasing the amount of exports and imports, might enable those countries to extend their mercantile marine; and if it should happen that their governments should continue, with regard to our shipping, the system which we have so long enforced against their own, it is possible that our merchant vessels would not increase in the same proportion. But how should they be diminished? From what department of the carrying trade should we be driven, which we now enjoy? Is it possible to suppose, that any nation in the world—not even excepting the United States—possesses so great a superiority over us in skill or capital, as to compete with us on our coasts, in our fisheries, in our trade with the West Indies and the two continents of America, or in our commerce with the East? Or is it not rather more than probable, that with our present advantages, augmented by the removal of restrictions, of which the tendency of many is to raise the price of the materials of shipping—as, for instance, the preposterous duty on European timber, in favour of the Canadian monopoly—is it not more than probable that it is we who should drive the vessels of other nations from the maritime trade, and monopolize the seas by dint of successful competition, as we have formerly done by exclusion or force? It shows but a small acquaintance either with the principles of trade, or the peculiar facts relating to the state of our merchant service, to entertain the contrary apprehension.

But granting, for a moment, that the decay of our merchant service, would ensue from a change in the Navigation Laws: Is it certain that such an event would be followed by a decline of our naval superiority? We think not. We see no essential connexion between the prosperity of the one service and the other. The experience of the merchant service is no necessary preparative for navy sailors. They may be reared as well, or better, in the naval service itself. All that is necessary for keeping up an effective supply to meet the sudden exigency of a declaration of war, is the establishment of a sufficient school—an increase in the present naval force, and the appointment of a larger number of men to the King's ships, in time of peace. We are of opinion that this plan should be adopted, independently of commercial views, for the purpose of preventing or diminishing the practice of impressment; a practice which has long been the disgrace of the British navy: but dismissing that consideration for the present, we maintain that the plan suggested would amply provide for the naval service of the country, and obviate all objections to the emancipation of our foreign and colonial trade, which are based on the Navigation Laws.

But this plan is an expensive one:—Granted. If the estimates of the Navy, which amounted last year to something less than 6,000,000*l.*, be doubled—it will be admitted that, for such a sum, the plan might be effected. If so, the objection on the side of expense is unworthy a moment's hesitation: It has been calculated—and the calculation is accurate enough for the purpose—that the tax levied by the operation of the Corn Laws on British grain amounts to 15,000,000*l.\ This tax is now raised for the exclusive advantage of the landlords. Something more than one-third of it would suffice for the maintenance of the force proposed to be added to the navy, and the people would still be relieved by the adoption of a free trade in corn, from the burthen of the remaining two-thirds. This, however, though the most prominent, is but a single instance of monopoly. It is evident, that whatever is paid by the public for any article of consumption, when raised by the restrictive system, above its natural price, is a tax which in no way differs from the taxes paid to the state, excepting that in every case but that of corn, it is paid into no man's pocket, but is merely squandered for the maintenance of certain trades, which could not be maintained in a fair and open competition, and which ought not, therefore, to be maintained at all. The articles which are so raised in price, by the artificial increase in the cost of their production—the articles on which this wasteful tax is levied—are too numerous to admit of, and too well known to require specification. By the abolition of restraints on trade, such commodities would be reduced to their natural price, and this wasteful impost would be saved. All that is wanted is a security for our navy; a security of which, for the present purpose, we would consent to estimate the cost at the extravagant sum of 10,000,000*l.* To levy this sum in the shape of excise or custom duties, on the commodities in question, instead of flinging away the whole amount of the difference between their natural and artificial price, is an obvious suggestion.

Exportation of Machinery.

We know of no question to which the principles of economical science may be applied with more certainty or with less qualification, than that which has been raised of late, with respect to the policy of exporting British machinery. The considerations arising from the state and practice of foreign countries, or domestic interests, which grievously embarrass our attempts at introducing a system of free trade in other cases, in this are both few and unimportant.

In every case of commercial prohibition, whether importation or exportation be its object; in every case, in short, in which the public are compelled to buy a particular commodity at a given place, of a given seller, or of a certain manufacture or growth, their interests and those of the seller are at variance. If they could purchase cheaper goods elsewhere, they pay a tax to the seller to whom they are compelled to resort: if they could not, they would resort to him without compulsion. Nothing more is required to shew, that to protect the seller is to tax the public; and what makes it the less tolerable, the tax is taken from the public, not for the purpose of being put into the seller's pocket, but merely to maintain him in the same, if not a worse, condition than he would have stood in, had he never been protected at all. If the seller gained what the public paid, no loss would be incurred on the whole account: there would be no waste of wealth, but only a change in its distribution—a bad one, certainly; but still preferable to an absolute loss. Here, however, the money is spent, and no one is the better for it: it might as well be thrown into the sea. It may, however,—and we are ready to admit the justice of the argument; it may be urged, that however impolitic towards the object of protection, and unjust to the whole community, restraints on trade might have been in the beginning, the same epithets cannot now be applied to them without an abuse of terms. Trade, it may be said, has long since been diverted by these obstructions, and settled in new channels, which, as they owed their origin to the imposition of these obstacles, would now be dried up by their removal. Here then, undoubtedly, a new consideration arises. The party protected may justly say, that without any gain on his part,—any thing that might be deemed a recompence for future loss, the law has placed him in that condition, that if the public interest be consulted, his must be sacrificed; that although he is nothing the better from the existence of protecting laws, he would be much the worse by their repeal; and that—without denying the principle, that the interests of the many are paramount to those of the few—it is still an argument against abolishing restraints on trade, that it can only be done at his expense. We can never shut our eyes to the urgency of these representations: we can never march forward in the path of commercial emancipation, without heeding the many private interests we may trample on in our way. They may be—in some cases, as for instance, in the corn and sugar trades, they are—so numerous, as materially to impede our progress, and to divert our path. But the present is a different case. We know of no relations, either foreign or domestic, which should prevent us from proceeding at once to a repeal of those injudicious restraints imposed by the wisdom of our forefathers on the exportation of machinery.

Objections, however, have been urged against the removal of these impediments, which appear to us to rest upon no other foundation than the alarm of certain classes of manufacturers, who believe that their interests would be compromised by such a course. These objections have been summed up in the Report of the Committee, which sat during the last session on this subject, under two heads. It is apprehended,

1. That in consequence of the large foreign orders which would probably be sent abroad, the price of tools and machines, if the free exportation were permitted, would be considerably and permanently raised at home:

2. That in a short time after the repeal of the present laws, foreigners would be able to undersell us in cotton goods, in lace made in frames, and in some other branches of manufacture.

A very few words will suffice for the first of these objections. It is one of the simplest and most evident principles of political economy, that the price of every commodity, which does not exist in a state of monopoly, must be determined permanently by the cost of production; and no reason is stated why machinery should be made an exception from this general rule. If the removal of restraints on exportation should cause an increased demand for machinery, as compared with that for other commodities, the wages of machine makers and the price of machinery would, in the first instance, rise; but this rise of wages would immediately cause a larger proportion of the population to apply themselves to the business of machine-making, and thus prices would ultimately be restored to their former level; no longer period being required for this purpose, than the time in which an apprentice can learn the more simple operations of the manufacture. In these views we are borne out by the testimony of most of the makers of machinery who were examined before the committee of the House of Commons; as well as by a fact which has recently occurred within our own knowledge. An increase in the demand for lace within the last two years, produced a considerable rise in the price of lace-frames, as well as in the wages of lace-frame makers, and of workmen employed in constructing machinery of a similar kind. Many persons, both amongst the artisans and the manufacturers, seemed to suppose that this state of things would be permanent; but a very short period has been sufficient to convince them of their error, and to restore both prices and wages to their natural level. Indeed, the only permanent effect of an increase of the demand for any commodity, must be to reduce rather than to raise its price; because, when a commodity is required in large quantities, its manufacture will admit of a more complete division of labour, and of a more extensive application of machinery. So far, then, are the manufacturers from being justified in their fears, that the free exportation of tools and machines would cause a permanent and considerable rise in their price at home, that its tendency in the long run would be rather to reduce than to raise it.

It is, however, upon the second of these objections that the chief reliance has been placed. It has been assumed, that the wealth and prosperity of this country are mainly owing to our superiority over other nations in manufactures; that this superiority is maintained by the present laws relating to the exportation of machinery, and that, consequently, the abolition of these laws would be highly injurious to the community. This argument contains various fallacies and unwarranted assumptions. We might have objected that it appears from the evidence, both of manufacturers of machinery and of custom-house officers, that the present restrictive laws are in a great degree inoperative, and that, instead of preventing the exportation of machinery, their utmost effect is to increase the expense of exportation: but we will not rely upon this statement; we wish to discuss the question on the broadest principles: we will therefore admit, for the sake of argument, that the present laws are as effectual as the most zealous supporter of the restrictive system could desire; and we will then endeavour to prove, that, even on this supposition, their effect, if any, must be purely prejudicial.

We will consider, in the first instance, the case of two nations trading with each other. We will suppose that a commercial intercourse exists between England and France; English manufactured cottons being exchanged for French silks. It will in this case be obviously the interest of both countries, that each should possess the greatest possible advantages in the manufacture of its own commodity. If by means of an improvement in machinery France can produce a larger quantity of silks than before, she will be willing to give a greater quantity in exchange for the same quantity of English cottons. Any improvement, in fact, in the manufacture of either commodity will tend to reduce its price, and will so be beneficial to the consumers in both countries.

But the question has been rendered more complicated by the introduction of a third country, for whose trade the two others are supposed to be competitors. The case has been supposed, in which England supplies America with cotton goods, and in which France, by obtaining English machinery, is enabled to produce cottons at a lower price, and thus to undersell her competitor in the American market. Now it is perfectly true that this would be highly injurious to the English cotton manufacturer, as it would render a considerable part of his capital of little or no value. To the nation at large it would be followed by no such effects. The interest of the public does not consist in the production of any particular commodity or the continuance of any particular trade; but in obtaining all commodities at the least cost, or, in other words, with the least expenditure of labour. There can, also, be no doubt that such a change would be injurious to that part of our labouring population who are employed in the manufacture of cottons, as they must necessarily be thrown out of employment. But if it be contended that this loss of employment would be permanent, and that there would be no other occupation to which they could have recourse; we answer, that there must always exist amongst nations a difference in their relative facility in producing various commodities; and that so long as this difference shall exist there must necessarily be some commodities on which a nation may advantageously employ its labour and capital with a view of changing them for the productions of its neighbours. Restrictive laws, therefore, can never permanently have the effect of increasing the means of employment in any country; but only tend to prevent each nation from applying itself to that employment for which it is best qualified by its local peculiarities and the character of its inhabitants.

But, however true and important may be the principles which we have thus endeavoured to lay down, they are not sufficient to prove the propriety of the immediate and entire abolition of the laws restricting the exportation of machinery. However wrong these laws may be in principle, and however injurious to the community, yet, if the existence of a great part of our manufactures actually depended upon their being maintained, the Legislature would not be justified in sacrificing at one stroke the property of a large class of persons; and the manufacturers might justly complain, unless their abolition were proceeded in with slow and cautious steps. It will, therefore, be highly important to determine whether the immediate repeal of these laws would be likely to be productive of injurious effects to our existing manufactures. For the solution of this question it will be requisite to consider, in the first place, what were the circumstances which originally caused England to become a manufacturing nation; and secondly, whether these circumstances exist to the same degree at the present moment. As it is only a few centuries since all countries were alike destitute of manufactures, England must manifestly have possessed some particular advantages which led to their institution in this rather than in other nations; and if it can be shown that these advantages, instead of being diminished since that time, are considerably increased, there will surely be no reason to apprehend their decline.

The principal circumstances which appear to have originally led to the institution of manufactures in this country are its insular situation—the extent of its coast and excellence of its harbours—the number of its navigable rivers—and the abundance of its mineral productions, more especially of coal and iron. It cannot be denied that this country still retains the superiority arising from these natural circumstances, and that it has also acquired other advantages which are the result of its own industry. Such, for instance, are the great improvements which have been made in its ports, the formation of extensive docks, and of numerous roads, canals, and other public works, and the diffusion of habits of manufacturing industry amongst the people—habits which are so difficult of introduction amongst an agricultural population. If, then, the possession of these natural advantages were the cause of our becoming, in the first instance, a manufacturing people, it would surely be most absurd to suppose, that, when united with all our acquired advantages, they would not be sufficient, without the aid of restrictive laws, to maintain our manufactures as at present established.

There are, indeed, some persons who attribute the rise of our manufactures to other causes; who maintain that the British possess a peculiarly inventive genius, and that they would be sacrificing the profits of their ingenuity if they were to permit the exportation of their machinery to other nations. It would be a mere waste of time to attempt the refutation of an objection founded upon the gross assumption, that the human mind is differently constituted on different sides of the Channel. Our inventive genius is not the cause of our manufactures; but we have become an inventive people, because it has been our interest to be manufacturers. Hundreds of Watts and Arkwrights may have lived and died in other countries unnoticed, because their peculiar powers of mind were not called into action; and if an example were required on such a subject, we might mention, that the most eminent inventor now living is a native of France, who has found it profitable to settle in this country, on account of the peculiar facilities which it affords to manufacturers*.

The objection which we have just noticed has sometimes been put in a different form. It has been said, that the laws against the exportation of machinery are productive of a peculiar advantage to Great Britain, in the same manner as a patent is profitable to an individual. However plausible such an argument may appear at first sight, the slightest examination will be sufficient to expose its fallacy. A patent is advantageous to an individual by giving him an exclusive right to the use of his invention; as it thus enables him to raise, at pleasure, the price of the commodity produced, and, consequently, to obtain more than ordinary profits. But it is obvious that the competition of the twenty millions of inhabitants of this country will operate as effectually in bringing down the profits of the manufacturer to the usual level, as if the manufacture were open to the whole world; and, consequently, that the restrictive laws cannot secure to him any peculiar profit. We may, then, conclude that our manufactures have neither been caused by our peculiar powers of invention, nor maintained by our restrictive laws; but that they are the natural result of the circumstances in which we have been placed. And we may be assured that if we are richer and more prosperous than our neighbours, it is not in consequence of any peculiar profit to be derived from manufactures, but because we have been more industrious and economical.

Having thus, as we believe, replied to the two propositions which were put forth in the Report of the Committee, as a summary of the objections to a repeal of the prohibition in question, we shall conclude by a brief notice of certain arguments which have been used, both in and out of Parliament, against the policy of such a repeal.

It has been said, that to permit the exportation of machinery would be to destroy the security of patents, since it would tend greatly to facilitate their infringement by foreigners. This objection assumes, first, that the present restrictive laws are an effectual protection to patents; and, secondly, that no other mode of protecting them can be discovered. Mr. Huskisson, however, states, that "the law of patents in this country nearly resembles that in France and the Netherlands, the countries of which the artisans are most jealous; and that when an artisan takes out a patent in England, he usually provides himself with the same safeguard in those two states*." It thus appears that, notwithstanding our restrictive laws, the evil has already been felt, and that a remedy has been actually provided.

It would, perhaps, not be right to conclude the present essay without noticing the only objection which has been advanced in the House of Commons against the free exportation of machinery. Mr. Littleton is reported to have expressed his fears that "the repeal of the law would necessarily drive artisans to accompany their machinery to foreign states; as a residence in this country, with the necessities of life at a high price, and exposed to foreign competition, which such a measure would unavoidably increase, would become impossible†." This objection would be more properly directed against the corn laws than against the free exportation of machinery. We will, therefore, refer our readers to the essay on that subject, where they will find that, however prejudicial the high wages required in this country may be, they do not, as is often supposed, raise the price of our manufactured goods. And as to the danger of the emigration of our artisans, surely no more effectual mode of forcing them abroad could be devised, than to prohibit the exportation of machinery, whilst we permit the emigration of the artisans by whom that machinery is manufactured.

We have thus endeavoured to shew, not only that the proposed repeal of the laws which prohibit the exportation of machinery is consistent with sound principles, or, in other words, beneficial to the public at large, but also that the British manufacturers have no reason to apprehend any injurious consequences to their own peculiar interests. But it may perhaps be said that, although the alteration may do no harm, it has not been shewn that it will be productive of any good, and that consequently, in adopting such a measure, we should be trying a dangerous experiment, without the prospect of any assignable advantage. It does not, however, necessarily follow that, because our manufacturers will sustain no injury, the community will derive no benefit from abolishing these restrictive laws. There are many manufactures, especially those of a coarser kind, which from particular circumstances, are, and always must be, carried on in the country in which the raw material is produced; and it is highly advantageous, as well for the British as the foreign consumer of such commodities, that every facility should be afforded for their production. But even if the proposed measure were not calculated to produce any immediate pecuniary benefit, yet, at a time when Government seems determined to introduce more liberal principles into our commercial system; when such principles are opposed by all the clamours which ignorance and sinister interest can raise; when, above all, the landlords are on the watch to make use of every protection to manufactures, as an argument against any alteration in the Corn Laws; at such a time, it is surely of some importance to shew an uncompromising adherence to sound principles. A consideration of our relations with other countries, will serve to expose still farther the folly of preserving useless restrictions on commerce. Foreign nations have been accustomed to consider our restrictive laws as the cause of our wealth and prosperity; they have regarded them as a cunningly devised scheme, by which we have transferred their money from their pockets to our own; they have consequently endeavoured, as much as possible, to follow our steps; and thus a system of mutual injury has been established. If, then, it be desirable to promote a more extensive commercial intercourse with other nations, we must, in the first place, do all in our power to convince them that we have really abandoned our former errors; and we must prove our sincerity, by repealing all the useless, as well as all the pernicious enactments which continue to disgrace our statute book. They will thus be taught in time to follow our example; and they will learn that every nation is directly interested in the prosperity of its neighbours, and that wealth is the effect, not of restrictive laws, but of industry, economy, and good government.

Corn Laws.

In consequence of Lord Liverpool's intimation, that a revision of the whole system of corn laws would be proposed by ministers, in the next session of parliament, we shall rather treat this question prospectively, than with a view to the comparatively insignificant debates to which this essay is appended. Those debates, however, were not unimportant, and will not pass without proper notice; but for any importance of their own they would scarcely have required so much discussion as we purpose to enter upon at present.

One thing, however, in these proceedings cannot fail to strike any man, who reads with his eyes open, and whose mind is duly qualified by habits of logical investigation, and that sure inquisitiveness which is never at fault in a maze of words—which cannot have a phrase imposed upon it as a meaning, nor a received opinion as an axiom;—one thing, we say, is obvious in those proceedings, and that is, the confusion and thick darkness which hang over the whole subject of this inquiry, and hide its most important features from the eyes of almost all who spoke upon it, in the two houses of parliament. With the exception of what fell from Lord Liverpool, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Whitmore, we have looked in vain through the other speeches for any principles, any extensive political views, any thing, in fact, beyond a mere perception of the exclusive interest of the individual and his class.

To prove this position, we have only to refer the reader to any speech he may chance to hit upon, in the section Corn Laws; but we prefer enumerating a few of the most striking instances of what we speak of, in order that so grave an accusation may not seem to have been hazarded without proof. With this view, we will glance at some of the leading fallacies to be met with in those debates. In this array Lord Lauderdale must stand first, both from his precedency in the discussion, and in his capacity of professed political economist. His Lordship, however, is not ashamed of alleging his dread of innovation, for the usual purpose of that fallacy—to carry his own views by getting rid of discussion altogether. “When ‘their lordships,’” he says, “considered ‘that the present system, under various ‘modifications, had endured for more than ‘a century, they could not be too cautious ‘in departing entirely from it. He did ‘not say that it was perfect; but it was ‘one under which the agriculture of this ‘country had long flourished. On this ‘ground he dreaded alteration*.” On what ground? Because it had endured for a century? Why, if it had endured for a thousand years, like the itch or the principle of population, would that be any reason for neglecting to apply a remedy, if the system be really morbid? His Lordship should have answered the charges alleged against the system, and then we might have judged whether his dread of alteration was a mere interest-begotten panic, or the result of deliberate conviction. As it is, he might as well have told us, that he dreaded an alteration in the Corn Laws, because objections had been urged against them, which he could not answer.

But Lord Darnley concurs in the opinion “that a system of so long standing ‘should not be changed, during this ‘mania for free trade, by the clamour ‘for cheap bread†.” On that ground it has never been contended that it should; but if that topic had been urged for such a purpose, we are not aware why the mania for free trade should make the time either more or less apt for adopting the suggestion. The anti-rational fallacies are of all others the most efficacious in two ways—either in deluding the hearer, or ruining the propounder's reputation, for sense or candour. It is far from our intention, in convicting the noble lord of this sophism, to fix the blame on his intentions: neither for a single blunder, do we mean to impeach his good sense. We are happy to believe them spotless; but we may remark, that a few verdicts against any man on a charge of resorting to those fallacies—which no man has recourse to, unless he has no other at command, would exhaust his character for ingenuity, were he as wise as the wisest of his ancestors.

But we prefer even these fallacies to the bold attempt of Colonel Wood, who would not even look the Bonded Corn bill in the face, “because he deprecated any thing that looked like breaking in upon the “Corn Laws*.” Here is a legislator calling upon Parliament to dismiss the consideration of a measure, which he says, is a bad measure, because he says, it would lead to another measure, which he also says, is a bad measure. What an opinion Colonel Wood must entertain of the House of Commons!

We must not, however, from too great a partiality to this gentleman's mode of reasoning, omit to add, that it was improved upon by the Earl of Limerick, who not only objected to the Bonded Corn bill, as a covert violation of the Corn Laws; but, because he was indisposed “to coincide with the crude opinions of the professors of that new philosophy of political economy, no two of whom agreed in the doctrines of their sect†.” Those opinions are undoubtedly crude; for we have Lord Limerick's word for it. There is no doubt, also, that their being new, is strongly presumptive against their truth; seeing that no useful discoveries have been hit on of late, in this age of steam-engines and gas, and that Corn Laws had before been commended, because they were old. Then, again, the doctrines of this new and crude philosophy must undoubtedly be rejected, because a difference of opinion with respect to them, exists amongst the partisans of the philosophy, who strangely enough compose a sect without agreeing in a single opinion.

But we are told by Lord Lansdown, that “all practical men are agreed in the necessity of a protecting duty, and

“that he did not know any persons who espoused the doctrine of a perfectly free-trade in corn, except some few who are led away by abstract principles and theories‡.” According to this position, the question is apparently settled; for all those who know any thing about the matter, namely, the practical men, are unanimous in a certain opinion; none object to it, but theoretical men, who, knowing nothing, are not to be listened to. Such is the natural meaning of the observation, and understanding it in that sense, we should only remark, that Lord Lansdown had employed two common words in a singularly uncommon acceptation. Practical and theoretical, thus considered, are equivalent to informed and ignorant. Now they are most likely to be informed in any branch of knowledge, who have made the most extended inquiries, and deduced their opinions respecting it, from the greatest variety of facts. Such men, in the common use of terms, are called theoretical men; as a theory, if it mean any thing, is a view of all that is known concerning a given subject. Hence, in the application of scientific principles to particular ends—as in applying the science of mechanics to the construction of a spinning-jenny, we resort to the theoretical man. When the machine has been constructed by the wisdom of the man of theory, a subordinate agent appears—as in the instance above mentioned, a spinner, who acts with the material supplied by the theorist's intelligence, and is, in fact, little more than a portion of the theorist's machine. This, in common language, is the man of practice; and this is the only known distinction between theoretical and practical men.

Here, however, by referring to facts, we find, that Lord Lansdown has not been inverting the common acceptation of the terms; he has adhered to it accurately enough. But he has stumbled upon an anti-rational fallacy. He has been contrasting the spinner's knowledge of mechanics, with Arkwright's and Watt's, and talking of Mr. Webb Hall, as Mr. Huskisson's superior in the principles of political economy; for we assert, without deferring to their opinion, that whatever practical men may think, the opinion of perhaps the greater number of well-informed persons—political economists, or not—is in favour “of a perfectly free trade in corn.”

Having restored the terms to their common meaning, we may observe, that when a practical man is referred to for an opinion in the science of which he practices an art, he speaks in the capacity of a theorist; and as his means of acquiring knowledge will have been commonly very limited, his opinion will be often very bad. Thus, Mr. Webb Hall, though probably a good practical farmer, was, for want of opportunities of study, an abominable judge of the policy to be pursued in respect to the corn-trade; whereas Mr. Huskisson may be a very good one, although he never saw an agricultural implement, and might mistake a crop of wheat, as Lord Erskine did, for a field of lavender. Mr. Ricardo once stopped the mouth of some dogmatical man of practice in the House of Commons, by assuring him, that not only was he a theoretical economist, although the gentleman was not aware of it himself—just as the Bourgeois in Moliere had been talking prose all his life without knowing it; but that he was one of the most extravagant theorists he had ever met with, even amongst the practical men. No man gives vent to more theories than Lord Lansdown himself, and as they are frequently very good, we were the more surprised at his adopting this singular argument.

We next notice the assertion of the Earl of Roesslyn, “that it was incumbent on the legislature to recollect that numerous contracts had been entered into on the faith of the present law, which it was understood should be permanent* ;” to which Mr. Curteis adds, “that to propose any alteration which should have the effect of reducing the prices of corn, would be a breach of faith with the farmerst.”

In the first place this assertion is untrue; for in no clause of the Corn Laws is any pledge to be found for their inviolability. But supposing such a provision to exist, what would be its binding effect? The legislature having voluntarily bound themselves to enrich a portion of the community at the expense of the whole—although the object of their existence is to protect the whole against any predominant portion—are, in fact, under the same obligation to the usurping portion that an agent would be to a third party, to whom he had assigned, without authority, the property of his principal. The act would be null and void, and utterly without effect in both cases. We are far from denying, that the Government may legitimately endow individuals, or minorities of the community, with peculiar privileges, for certain periods of time, as in the case of patents, and trading monopolies; but that is on the principle that such temporary privileges are ultimately beneficial to the public. We admit also, that the Government may contract for a perpetual renunciation of public property, or public rights, for an equivalent; as they lately purchased of the Duke of Atholl his peculiar jurisdiction in the Isle of Man. But in the present case, no such principle can be applied. The plea of contract would not have been set up, if the consideration of the agreement had been forthcoming. When a tradesman demands a debt of his customer, he does not tell him that he ought to be paid because his debtor contracted to pay him, but because he had sold him a horse or a pipe of wine. What have the agricultural interest sold to Government? Neither is this like the case of patent; for the exemption claimed is perpetual:—“A free-trade in corn,” says Lord Redesdale, “can never exist†.” The supporters of this argument can only avoid the force of these objections on one hypothesis,—that the Government is not bound in its transactions by any paramount obligation to the people. We shall not argue the question on that ground. Such a bargain, as regards the contracting parties and the people, is not a contract but a conspiracy.

Such are the strange fallacies into which men of good understanding are so frequently misled by adopting opinions upon trust, or partial inquiry, or what is perhaps still more common, at the imperceptible suggestion of private interests. We might easily swell the list, if our space permitted; but having removed this preliminary rubbish, which lies at the door of every political inquiry, and may be, and is daily applied to subjects the most dissimilar, we will proceed to notice a fallacy more exclusively connected with the subject of this discussion, and which will lead us at once to a consideration of the principles upon which the substantive question hinges. The sophistry we have hitherto exposed has been principally urged with a view of staving off inconvenient discussion. It is not, however, to be supposed that all the bad reasoning lies on that side. On neither side, with a few rare exceptions, is it possible to discover the least glimmering of principle, however narrow; much less an extended view of the nature and bearings of the question, or a delineation of its effects on the different classes of society. We can find little more than vague remarks, unsupported by reasons, although sounding smoothly and popularly, and wearing a conciliatory appearance. Thus we learn from Lord Liverpool "this truth, that though the classes connected with the land view the Corn Laws in a different light from those connected with trade, the true interests of all classes on this question are really the same*." This truth, however, is laid down as a postulate—although we hold it to be a theorem, which not only stands in need of, but is, in fact, incapable of proof. The Earl of Lauderdale, and many others, are of opinion, that the manufacturers would be ruined by an impoverishment of the landed interest, from a decline in the price of corn; whereas Mr. Maberly, and others, contend, that the manufacturers will be shortly driven from the foreign market by the competition of the cheap labour of the Continent with the high-priced labour in England—a high price occasioned by the corn-monopoly. Many similar notions were put forth in the course of the debates, which, sophistical or not, cannot be so easily disposed of as those fallacies we have already examined. For the purpose of investigating their truth, as well as of putting the question in what seems to us its true position, it will be necessary to enter at some length into the mode in which the several classes of the community are affected by the Corn Laws.

With a view to this question, we are accustomed accurately enough to divide the community into three classes:—the agriculturists, the merchants and manufacturers, and the labourers. We will treat of the interests of those classes, as far as they are distinct, in order.

In the phrase agricultural, or landed interest, the supporters of the Corn Laws include the landlords and farmers; and that portion of the clergy—by far the larger portion—who derive their income from the soil. That the interests of these classes are served by the restrictive system, although in very different degrees, and in consequence of very opposite causes, we may readily admit. We shall, therefore, proceed to examine how, and in what degree, the members of the agricultural interest are respectively concerned in perpetuating the existence of the system.

The effect of admitting foreign corn, if any, would be a fall in the price of our own. But a fall in price, from such a cause, must be followed by a reduction in the quantity produced at home. It is not to be supposed that the demand would be materially increased by the fall in price. The consumption of corn is but little affected by such causes: bread, by a corn-fed population (and we are not yet reduced to potatoes), must be had at all events; and whether the loaf cost sixpence or a shilling, there will not be much difference in the total quantity consumed. It is most likely, then, that whatever might be the amount of imported corn, to that extent, or nearly so, would the demand for home-grown be lessened. But in exact proportion to the falling-off in the home supply, would the corn-rent of the landlord be diminished. His money-rent (in other words, his command over the comforts and luxuries of life) would be lessened in a still greater proportion.

The truth of this statement admits of easy demonstration. Corn-rent is the excess of the produce on the superior soils above that on the inferior; or, what is in effect the same thing, the difference between the produce of successive doses of capital, when applied to the soil with successively diminishing returns. If we suppose only two soils in tillage, A and B; A producing 100, and B only 90 quarters; the rent would be 10 quarters, or the difference between the returns to A and B. It is manifest that such must be the fact. The occupier of B would cease to cultivate his farm, unless a return of 90 quarters would replace his outlay, with the addition of the usual profits of stock. But if 90 quarters would satisfy the occupier of B, they would remunerate the occupier of A; and the owner of A would insist on receiving the difference of 10 quarters, for the privilege allowed the occupier of cultivating the land. It is thus that the landlord gains by the cultivation of inferior soils; as the difficulty of raising corn increases, his share of the produce is increased. If, taking the former case, the cultivation of B would give 10 quarters for rent, the cultivation of C, of which we will call the produce 80 quarters, would raise his rent to 20 quarters; the cultivation of D, with a return of only 70 quarters, would swell his share to 30 quarters. Whatever, then, diminishes the demand for domestic produce (and such would be the effect of importation), has a tendency to contract corn-rents, by throwing the less fertile lands out of tillage. Thus if the whole return to A, B, C, and D, were no more than sufficient to supply the market, in the absence of foreign produce; should foreign corn be imported, and, by its greater cheapness, compel the farmers to abandon the cultivation of D, it is plain that corn-rents would fall from 30 to 20 quarters.

Such is the process by which landlords would suffer in the quantity of their share of the produce; we will now shew how their money-rents would stand affected by the same cause.

So long as the supply is equal to the demand—a state to which all necessities have a constant tendency—price, it will be admitted, is governed by the cost of production. What it cost to produce a commodity, will determine the sum for which the producer will sell it. Competition will prevent his getting more; a regard for his own interest will not permit him to take less. But the cost of producing corn, or in other words, the quantity of capital and labour required for its production, increases with the necessity of resorting to inferior soils. To the same outlay of capital and labour, A yields 100 quarters, B only 90 quarters, and C only 80 quarters; that is, the cost of production, and hence the price of corn, if money and other things maintain the same relative value, is successively enhanced by resorting to the inferior kinds of land. Here, then, is a further benefit which the landlord derives from their cultivation. He first gains in the quantity of his produce, and next in its price; first in corn-rent, next in money-rent.

To make this more obvious, suppose that the 100 quarters obtained from A are produced by a given quantity of capital and labour, and the price of corn to be 31. per quarter. If the same capital and labour applied to B, will yield only 90 quarters, the price would rise from 31., to 31. 6s. 8d.* In the case of C, which yields but 80 quarters, the price would be 31.16s., and if D. were brought into cultivation, it would rise to 41. 2s. 10d. (omitting fractions). As A, B, C, and D, were successively brought into cultivation; or as the corn-rent rose from 10 quarters to 30 quarters, the landlord would successively receive, as money-rent, or, corn-rents and money-rents would respectively increase, as follows:

The price of 10 qrs. at £3 6 8 or £33 6 8
 20 qrs. at 3 15 0 or 75 0 0
 30 qrs at 4 2 10 or 124 5 0

Corn-rent as 10	Money-rent as 10
..... 20	..... 22½
..... 30	..... 37½

If such be the rate of increase, it needs no further remark to demonstrate in what proportion the money-rent of the landlords would be diminished, by a decrease in the price of agricultural produce; a decrease, which is the chief, though not the only benefit of a free trade in foreign corn.

The case of the Church requires no particular discussion. The takers of tithes would suffer in precisely the same manner, as the receivers of rent; by a diminution of their shares in quantity, and a more than equal diminution in price.

But the farmer, as he stands in a totally different relation to the rest of the community; the farmer, who is, in fact, a manufacturer; between whom, and the manufacturer of silk or cotton, there is no other difference than in the names of their respective commodities; the loss of the farmer from a change in the system of corn laws, bears no resemblance whatever to the loss of the landlord and the tithe-taker. The evils of a repeal to him, would arise from two sources; the destruction of a portion of his capital, and the previous bargain with his landlord as to the rent of his farm.

When we speak of the transfer of capital from one employment to another, in consequence of a change in the rate of profits in one of them, we are apt to forget in the brevity of general reasoning, that transfer in such cases, very frequently means destruction. A transfer is more peculiarly destructive, when the employment about to be relinquished, is conducted by means of a large portion of fixed capital; a kind of capital frequently inapplicable to any other purpose, and always liable to great deterioration in the process of transfer. A mere list of the different items of which agricultural fixed capital is composed, will shew the great difficulty in removing some, the impossibility of detaching the greater part of it from the soil in which it is invested. Drains, ditches, fences, and manure, are as fixed as the earth itself; a drain of prodigious cost would be rendered entirely valueless, by an abandonment of the particular occupation, and an out-going tenant may as easily move a mountain as a hedge. The agricultural buildings are reduced by such an operation, to the value of their brick and timber; while considerable loss is sustained in the more moveable implements; on the ploughs, carts and waggons, and the whole of the farming stock, from a fall in their market-price, the consequence of a contracted demand for articles of that description. The loss sustained from this source, is of course proportioned to the fall in agricultural prices, occasioned by the influx of cheaper corn. It is a loss which cannot be avoided by the actual generation of farmers, engaged in the production of dear corn; but to omit other topics of consolation, it is mitigated by the reflection, that when suffered, it is suffered once for all; that succeeding farmers would be benefitted by the change in common with the rest of the community; and that even to the present generation there are compensating events attending it, which make it difficult to say within how small a compass, we may not be reasonably permitted to circumscribe their real loss. Herein consists the wide difference between the landlord's and the farmer's interest, in a high price of corn. Landlords and tithe-paid clergymen of every generation, are necessary gainers by a rise in price; the farmers of one generation may be losers by a fall, but they never, even in that generation, can be permanent gainers by a rise.

The loss arising to the farmer from the terms of existing contracts, between himself and his landlord requires notice, only to shew that it has not been overlooked. It is an item, undoubtedly, of great importance, but, like the last, it is incapable of valuation, from the fortuitous nature of the circumstances upon which its amount depends. The price of corn at the time of leasing; the fall in price from the admission of cheap corn—circumstances of which the value must be calculated for the particular case—will determine the extent of the farmer's loss from this cause.

Such, we believe, is the amount of loss in which the members of the agricultural interest would respectively participate from a repeal of the Corn Laws. With regard to the class of farmers, whose name is unwarrantably blended in a single appellation, with that of the other members of the association, as if they were necessarily sharers in a common interest, we have much remaining to observe. In fact, a strict adherence to method, would have required us to have postponed all mention of the farmer's interest, until we entered into the consideration of those of the capitalist and the labourer. But as we must have prefaced that arrangement by statements, which would have been to the full as much misplaced as what we have already said; it seemed better to fall in thus far with the general mode of speaking on the subject, and to reserve the gist of the argument for its proper place.

From what has been already stated, the utility of further inquiry might well admit of doubt, if we followed the example of the landlords, who, like all other men, are too apt to regard themselves as alone entitled to protection, to look upon high rents as a test of national prosperity, and to hold every thing well so long as they have their cakes and ale. But we must turn to another picture. The owners of land and tithe, have undoubtedly, a common right to the protecting care of Government; but they have only a common right. In the discussion of this question they have a right to have their interests fairly stated; we have endeavoured, without adding or diminishing, to represent them fairly; we shall try to be equally impartial with regard to the rest of the community.

Next in order, then, is the manufacturing and commercial class, including the employers of every kind of capital, with the exception of agricultural stock. The effects of the corn monopoly on this class, under any circumstances, are purely mischievous; in whatever point of view they are regarded, they conduce to the same injurious result, a fall in the rate of profits.

In tracing the causes which lead to this disastrous consequence, we must include in our consideration the interest of a third class—the labourers; for although we cannot agree with Lord Liverpool and those comfortable speculators, in whose eyes the prosperity of the manufacturers and the farmers—for the labourers are not so much as mentioned—form the sides of one graceful arch, of which the landed proprietary is the key-stone, it is certain that in respect of the corn question, the interests of the capitalist and the labourer not only coincide, but are inseparable.

Of all the improvements in economical science, we know of none more important than the principle from which this statement is deduced; and which teaches that the rate of profits is determined by the rate of wages. We take the principle for granted; if we were called upon to demonstrate every principle which is applicable to this subject, our article would not be an essay on the Corn Laws, but a treatise on political economy. To ascertain, therefore, the effects of this monopoly on profits, we must first determine its influence on wages—an inquiry, like some of the preceding ones, somewhat tedious to superficial readers, but for which we make no apology to those who are willing to pay the price for understanding this interesting subject.

Our first proposition is a short one. A restriction on the trade in corn, however it may affect the price of that commodity, will leave the price of other things unaltered. There will be, for instance, the same quantity of money, and the same quantity of cloth and cotton; and these will exchange one for another in the same proportion as before the corn restriction existed. If, therefore, a yard of cloth cost 25s. before that event, it will cost 25s. after it. Hence, also, the labourer who gained 15s. a-week before the passing of a corn law, must continue to work for the same wages, notwithstanding the consequent rise in corn; for there will be the same total amount of capital and the same number of labourers as before. On this supposition, therefore, the Corn Laws operate as a tax on wages: and that, as we shall show hereafter, for the exclusive benefit of the landlords—a tax drawn from the necessities of the poorest, the feeblest, and beyond measure the most numerous class, for the purpose of increasing the superfluities of that comparatively small body, who are already in possession of enough and more than enough both for use and pleasure, and who wield for their own defence and profit the irresistible arm of power.

But there are limits to a tax on wages. Every thing not strictly essential to the being of the labourer; every thing which constitutes his well-being, may be extorted by the grasp of law: but taxation can go no further. The labourer may be gradually stripped of every thing which can make life desirable or even tolerable to a thinking being; but there is a modicum of wages which admits of no further diminution; there is that which has been termed a natural, or necessary rate; meaning by natural wages, little more than enough to sustain the animal functions in sufficient vigour to endure the requisite amount of daily toil—allowing neither the means nor time for pleasure or convenience, scarcely even for sustenance and sleep. Such, we know, is the situation of the labourers in many parts of Ireland, and in some parts of England. In Dorsetshire, for example, the wages of agricultural labour have for some time past not exceeded 7s. a-week. When the people are at this point, their wages are no longer governed by their numbers. A certain portion of food and clothing they must have. To so many as are necessary for the purpose of employing capital, that portion will be given. If they exceed that number, the superfluous population perishes. Here, then, a rise in the price of corn produces a new effect. There is the same amount of capital to be employed, requiring the same quantity of labour; but the food which maintains the labourer has risen in value, and a greater share of the produce of capital must be allotted to his support;—in fact, wages rise, and they rise at the expense of profits. We may, therefore, describe the possible effects of a corn law, thus. If the wages of labour exceed their necessary rate, the tax first falls on them. The degree in which they are affected depends on the extent of the rise in the price of corn. If it exceed the difference between the actual amount of wages and wages at the necessary rate, the excess falls on the profits of capital. In the first case they, for whom the Corn Laws are enacted, lay violent hands on the labourer; in the second, they slich from the capitalist. The rise in the price of corn must be paid for by one of the two classes: what is not subtracted from the working people, is taken from the manufacturers and merchants.

How much of this process is produced by the English Corn Laws, it is not very easy to decide; but, in fact, the question is rather one of curiosity than use. The difficulty, such as it is, arises in a great degree from the artificial mode in which wages, and particularly agricultural wages, are paid in this country; a portion only coming directly from the employer and the rest from the parish. The example of Ireland has made it more than probable that without the system of poor laws, wages would sink much lower than they have ever yet sunk in England. The fact is, that the poor laws have fixed with us, what nature—to use the metaphor of the political economists—has fixed in other countries. They have determined, in a great degree, the lowest mark to which wages shall be permitted to subside. If the master's payment increase, the parish allowance is diminished; if the contrary, it is augmented. The necessary rate in England is composed, therefore, of the average sum of wages so called, and the poor's allowance;—not the sum in money, but in that which money will purchase, in the necessaries of life. The sum, in money, may vary; but so long as relief is afforded by the parish, the quantity of necessaries which the money commands will be the same. But the poor rates—those at least which are not paid out of rent—are contributed by the owners of capital. So long, then, as any poor rates are expended on the maintenance of able labourers, the profits of capital are taxed in a corresponding proportion.

In such circumstances, what the capitalist really pays in wages, is, what he nominally pays as such, together with his assessment to the parish rate; and any rise in the price of corn in consequence of the Corn Laws, which increases this disbursement, is in effect a tax on profits for the use of the landed interest.

That profits are really taxed in this country by the operation of the Corn Laws, may be proved from another consideration. It is clear, from the necessity we are under of cultivating such inferior soils, as could not be cultivated without loss under a system of free trade, but which it is the very object of the Corn Laws to keep in tillage. The mode in which the return to capital is successively diminished by its employment on successively inferior soils, has been noticed in our former remarks on the effects of foreign importation on the landlord's rent. It is plain that the rate of profit on agricultural stock cannot long continue lower than that on capital in general. No such prodigy can permanently exist as two rates of profit in the same country, and as the demand for agricultural produce leaves no choice as to the tillage of the poorer soils, the general rate of profit must fall to the level of the agricultural, for the agricultural cannot rise.—Now, mark the intimate connexion between the interests of the labourer and the capitalist. The fall of profits impedes and may ultimately put a stop to the accumulation of wealth—in other words, to the means of employing labour; but such is the natural inequality between the increase of capital and the growth of population, that the latter still advances, when the augmentation of the former is suspended; and as every step which widens the disparity between them is a step, on the part of the working classes, towards a state of penury and want, it is no trivial charge against the Corn Laws, in this view of the question, that they not only cripple the resources of the manufacturing interest, but tend to impoverish and degrade the labourer. That, however, is only on the supposition—and we do not wish to conceal it—that wages are above their necessary rate. But if not, the labourer is not uninjured; for, although his wages cannot sink, the permanent rise in the price of corn reduces him to despair; it destroys even the chance of amelioration from a rapid increase of capital—be that chance how small soever, and renders his condition, already too hard for endurance, altogether hopeless.

We may as well conclude in this place what remains to be said, with regard to the condition of the labourer, as affected by the Corn Laws. The foregoing conclusions might be granted, and still it might possibly be alleged, that a large race of agricultural labourers has grown up under the existing system, whose services would be rendered useless by a change at the present moment, and who would therefore be turned adrift on the world, not only with a new employment to seek, but what is even harder, to learn. To them, it might be said, the Corn Laws are beneficial, in the same sense as they are advantageous to the farmers: that they confer, at least, the negative advantage of securing them in a less productive occupation, whilst a free system, however ultimately beneficial, would, in the interim, expose them to the peril of a total cessation of employment. This objection, however, has less real than apparent cogency. A transfer of capital, as it is called, is, in most cases, a serious evil, because the great bulk of the capital is not susceptible of transfer without suffering a destructive diminution. But this is not the case with labour; that may be transferred uninjured. The only difficulty is the intermediate support of the labourer whilst in the act of passing from his old to his new employment. We do not mean to say, that the demand in other quarters would be so instant as not to leave time for some depression in the wages of agricultural labourers; but considering how rarely the actual wages of that class can elevate them much above the parish fare, we certainly see no reason to believe that their scanty resources would suffer any serious diminution, which would not be tolerably supplied by a little greater than ordinary distribution of parochial relief. The ground we are treading on verges on the extreme of hypothesis; and we are far from offering these remarks with the same confidence that we repose in others. But we cannot help thinking, that the route we have pursued is the right one, although the conclusions it might ultimately lead to, had we sufficient data to proceed upon, might not square exactly with our expectations.

A more conclusive argument might be drawn, with respect to the condition of the labourers, from their actual condition in this and most European countries; let the objection be modified—let it not be averred that they would suffer—let it only be said that they would not gain by a free-trade in corn, and we admit it. We admit it with respect to those, and we grieve to think that they form a large proportion of the whole of the working classes, whose wages are at such a rate as to endure no farther diminution. Consistently with our former reasoning, we are bound to concede this point. If the free importation of foreign corn should in fact do no more than emancipate the capitalist from a tax on profits; if the number of the people, as compared with the means of employing them, should still be found so great as to allow of no increase in their wages—it is plain that the labouring classes would receive no benefit from the change. But even should the cheapness of corn enhance their real wages; if that portion of the seven shillings which the Dorsetshire labourer now allots to the purchase of food, should suffice for more food than he would consume, we should see but little gain in that circumstance. The tendency in that portion of the people to overstock the labour market is so decided, that wages would not fail to be reduced in a few years to the same level of want as before. We cannot close our eyes on this fact. Not to speak of long personal experience, which would be reckoned, as it ought to be, of little moment—the universal accord of all who are acquainted with the business of an English parish, backed by the arithmetical authority of parish-registers and statistical tables, leave no doubt of this melancholy fact. This is not the place for considering by what means the wages of the lower classes of labourers can be increased; although that is a subject of all others the most important:—we have entered into this discussion to justify our former concession, that a repeal in the Corn Laws would not be followed, at least for any permanence, by a rise in real wages.

We cannot, therefore, agree with those who hold up the Corn Laws to the common people as the great cause of their distress. This, we think, is an injurious delusion. There is only one cause worth speaking of, which perpetuates in this country the degradation of the labouring class. That cause, it can never be repeated too frequently, is the excess in the number of the people. To ascribe their poverty to any other, is only to mislead them. If corn were double its present price, the people, by limiting their numbers, might have as much of it as they wished; if it were twice as cheap, at their ordinary rate of increase, they would be shortly as poor as ever.

But because we think there is little to hope, for the benefit of this portion of the lower orders, from a repeal of the Corn Laws, let us not be understood to assert that they suffer no evil from their existence. The evil they endure from the fluctuation in the price of corn, which is incidental to the restrictive system, is scarcely less than that inflicted on the capitalists and the farmers. Of this we shall speak further bye and bye; for the present we must return to the manufacturers and merchants.

The supporters of the Corn Laws tell us that whatever may be the labourer's interest, the farmers and the manufacturers must stand or fall together:—that is their phrase: and they ask triumphantly, should the agriculturists cease to consume, as they must do, unless protected in their monopoly, will the manufacturers continue to produce?

In answering this question, we must distinguish between two sets of manufacturers. There are some, comparatively few in number, and employing a small amount of capital, who manufacture exclusively for the use of the agricultural class; such as wheel-wrights, blacksmiths, and carpenters. They, we admit, must stand and fall with the farmers. They may, in fact, be conveniently considered as members of the agricultural interest. The same remark may be extended, though not in the same degree, to those provincial traders, the grocer, the linen-draper, and the tailor, who supply the agricultural classes with the produce of the manufacturer. These, however, employ little capital which could suffer from a change in the mode of its employment. The change to them, would be little more than a change of customers. But with regard to the mass of manufacturers, they would never stand more upright than when the agriculturists should, in their own phrase, be fallen. For what is it that they exchange their commodities with the English farmers? For corn. But corn, and that in the same quantity, must be had by the British consumers, whether grown at home or abroad; and when the English farmers "fall," it must be had from the foreign farmers, who will not be more backward to take our manufactures than the English; and what is more, will give us twice as much corn in return.

But in fact, it is not only the manufacturer, in the common use of the term, who is interested in a free trade in corn; the farmer himself is no less so. Whatever tends to depress the profits of stock in general, must have precisely the same effect on the productiveness of agricultural stock. The capital of the farmer will suffer from such a cause, no less than that of every body else. More capital indeed may and must be employed on the land, which, no doubt, is advantageous, to the landlord; but so long as it must be employed with a smaller profit, we are at a loss to understand how it can benefit the farmer. To the capitalist—and the farmer is as much a capitalist as the manufacturer or the merchant, the value of the field in which his stock is invested, is not determined by its extent, but by its productiveness. To us, and we do not suppose that we are peculiar in our preference of high profits, it seems unquestionable, that a farmer would do much better if he could extricate his capital from the soil, to employ it in weaving cotton or bombazeen, at 15 or 20 per cent. profit, than in growing corn at 10 or 12; just as, if we were citizens of the United States, we should say, that the manufacturer there would gain by growing corn at 50, instead of weaving cloth at 25 per cent., and endeavouring to compete with England—not in that commodity, in which the natural advantage of his country must give him an easy superiority, but in that in which our natural and acquired facilities must afford us an incontestible triumph.

We have now concluded the analysis of these separate operation of the Corn Laws on the different classes of society. They are undoubtedly beneficial to the owners of the soil and the tithe proprietors, whose incomes are bettered by them in a two-fold ratio; by an increase first in their share of the produce, and next in its value: they are advantageous to the present race of farmers, in as much only as they prevent the loss on agricultural capital, which the fall of prices, from a free trade in corn, would not fail to produce; and for a similar reason, though in a far less degree, they may be considered as beneficial to the class of agricultural mechanics and country shopkeepers. To the rest of the manufacturing and commercial classes, they are purely mischievous, by depressing the rate of profit,—an evil which equally affects the farmer, the agricultural mechanic, and the country trader, as employers of capital. And, lastly, they are injurious to the labouring people, if not by lessening their actual wages, at least by checking the increase of the fund which supplies them with employment, and thereby permanently degrading their moral and physical condition.

But the paramount evil of the Corn Laws is not confined to this or that order of men;—it affects all orders equally; or if it affect one class more than another, the chief sufferers, strange as it may seem, are among the members of the landed interest itself. The worst evil of these laws; that which spreads the most rapid and extensive desolation, from time to time, over every class, first breaking up the farmer, and uprooting the landlord from his fixed station in society, then harassing the manufacturer, and unsettling the condition of the labourer; an evil, glaring and oppressive as it is, which is overlooked by some, denied by others, and palliated by all who advocate a restraint on the importation of foreign corn—so perverse is the mental obliquity which men acquire by the exclusive contemplation of their own, unconnected with other people's interests;—the worst mischief incurred by the system of prohibition is the perpetual fluctuation of price, the inevitable effect, and were its infliction confined to the guilty, the just punishment of monopoly. When the law of 1815 was enacted, which provided that foreign wheat should not be permitted to enter the British markets till the price of the home-grown should have risen to 80s. a quarter, it was confidently supposed by the chief supporters of the law that it would have the effect of keeping prices at that level. A variation in price from other causes, it never entered into their hearts to conceive. They never adverted to the effects of a fluctuating supply; and yet it is obtrusively evident, that a permanent rate of price can only be sustained by a constant rate of supply and demand. The state, too, in which it is most difficult to preserve this equality, is precisely one of monopoly. In ordinary cases, if the home supply fall short, a sudden rise of price is prevented by timely importation; if the supply be excessive, an injurious depression is avoided by exporting the superfluity. Importation may still take place, if the deficiency raise prices to a certain point; but exportation, in the present situation of this country, may be pronounced impossible. British corn is grown at an expense far exceeding the cost of production abroad; whence to enable the British farmer to export, a fall must take place in prices to a ruinous extent. They must not only fall from their artificial height, to the natural prices of the continent; they must fall so much below them, as to cover the charges of exportation. Suppose corn in England to be at twice the average continental prices—a supposition by no means impossible in the event of a succession of defective harvests: if, for instance, it be 70s. a quarter, whilst foreign corn is at 35s. and a glut in the home-market should occur from an abundant crop; it is plain, if the cost of export be taken at 5s., that English corn must be sold for 30s. a quarter, before relief can be obtained by exportation. But years of excessive fertility must occasionally recur. They must always be followed by a destructive depression of prices, and fall as heavily on the landed interest, as defective harvests will fall on the other classes.

It is unnecessary to recur to examples. The experience of late years has furnished us with too many of the alternate distresses of the agricultural and manufacturing interests. If, therefore, it be desirable to perpetuate a high price of corn, it must be equally desirable to find means of limiting the home-supply: The Dutch, in certain years of abundance, burned a portion of the spices which were grown in their eastern settlements; and for their own interests they acted wisely. Will the English landlords emulate that example? If their corn laws must exist, we have no hesitation in asserting, that the destruction of superfluous produce would be a beneficial expedient; it would at any rate save a portion of the community; and contract the mischief of monopoly within a narrower sphere.

Every body knows, that the fluctuation we have described, is not only “true in theory,” but unhappily to the full as “true in fact.” We may be spared the labour of repeating the hackneyed tale of “agricultural distress,” and it is unnecessary to do more than call to mind the worse distresses of the labouring people, and a large portion of the capitalists in the years immediately preceding. These are topics of which it is enough to suggest the outline; the sketch may be filled up, and the colouring applied at leisure.

As little need be said on another source of apprehension, which a continuance of the Corn Laws might hereafter change into reality—the danger, not of over-production, but of famine; so opposite are the evils engendered by this monstrous system. If we ceased to purchase foreign corn—and such is the avowed desire of some, and the secret wish of many members of the landed interest, the growers in the exporting countries must proportionally contract their supplies. They would only grow for the foreign market; their crops would be averaged by the measure of foreign demand, and in the first emergency, in the first scanty harvest that might ensue in England, we should find their granaries half-filled, their stocks already engaged to their constant customers, from whom we should be driven to re-purchase them at a price which would be set by famine. This subject was ably handled by Mr. Whitmore, in his speech during the last session of Parliament; but before we dismiss it, we will take the opportunity it affords of dispatching a foolish, but prevalent notion concerning the necessity of preserving this country from a dependence on foreign, perhaps hostile nations, for its supply of corn. Depend on them we must. Is dependence an evil? We will not stop to say, nay. We will only say, that the Corn Laws afford no means of deliverance; if we do not choose to import, we must choose to starve.

We may observe, that these general objections to the corn-law system, prove no more than the utility, we may say, the necessity of abolishing it. To shew that it is hurtful to the landlord, to the farmer, to the capitalist, to the labourer, by placing their several incomes in a state of perpetual uncertainty; to shew that it injures the whole community, as consumers, by raising the price of bread and other necessities; to shew all this, and much more of the same general nature, only leads to the unpractical conclusion, that in those respects, the system is bad, and should, if possible, be set aside. But it teaches nothing as to the means, or the mode of getting rid of it. For that purpose, we must consult the peculiar interests on either side; we must endeavour to conciliate them, and where that is impossible, we must strike the balance, and relieve the majority with the least possible detriment to those, whose advantage is lighter in the scale. With this view we entered into that analysis, which, we fear, from our want of space, and the intricacy of the subject itself, is not quite so amusing as a speech on the Catholic question, although the topic at least is more important; and for the same purpose we refer the reader, before commencing the remainder of this essay, to the summary which concluded that analysis.

Having there, as we conceive, depicted the real state of interests—we speak only of pecuniary interests—with regard to the Corn Laws, we come to the question, What is the nearest point of union to which they can be brought by legislative interference? If Lord Liverpool's proposition concerning the identity of interests be unhappily false in fact, it is not the less desirable to make it true, as far as law can make it so.

If we inquire into the extent of the conflicting interests, there is no comparison in point of number between those who derive benefit from cheap corn, and those who profit by its dearth; the parties are the landed interest against the whole community. But if we look to the intensity of the interests, those of the minority are the more prominent.

A sudden repeal of the Corn Laws would inflict a certain and ruinous degree of suffering on every individual included in the landed body; on the other hand, the personal advantage of the several members of the community, though far from problematical in the end, would be neither sudden, nor extensive. These circumstances plainly point at the nature of the remedy to be desired. That which would go farthest to meet the interests of both parties, must be one which would reduce the loss of the agriculturists to the least amount, by the slowness of its operation, whilst it would in due time secure to the community those advantages of which they cannot be justly debarred by a well-intentioned government.

A duty on importation, regulated at first by the present cost of producing British grain, and lessening year by year, till the average price in our own should exceed that in foreign markets by no more than would compensate the owners of land for the tithe and other agricultural taxes—seems likely to effect this object.

We shall not here discuss the merits of these several plans, by which the principle we have just arrived at may be put in force; our object has chiefly been to set forth an impartial statement of the mode in which certain portions of the community are affected by the existence of the Corn Laws, and how they would gain or lose by their repeal. The great difficulty is to procure admission for the principle, which results, as it seems to us, from the foregoing statement.

For the agricultural interest, farmers as well as landlords, it reduces the inconvenience which they anticipate from a change in the Corn Laws, to the smallest possible amount; by giving time—the only remedy which, under their circumstances, it is in the power of the legislature to afford. But let them not suppose for a moment, that this remedy, however inadequate to save them harmless in the change, is an alternative; and, as they are apt to suppose, the worst alternative for their interests:—there is, in fact, no other remedy. A repeal of the present system would compel the farmer to transfer his capital, and the landlord to reduce his rents. True; but a continuance of it would, at intervals, do no less. Their option is not between high and low prices: low prices they must have; and their choice is restricted to a moderate price with a steady market, or that ruinous depression which results from the occasional gluts inseparable from a restrictive system. This is an alternative, which seems to exclude hesitation. The choice is between one act of retrenchment and a series of periodic bankruptcies. In the first case, the transition from monopoly prices to the level of a free trade, may be greatly facilitated by time. We know this opinion has been disputed. It has been said that the apprehension of what might happen on an opening of the ports, would probably be attended by a depression in price, even greater than that which would result from an actual importation. That effect might undoubtedly follow, if the farmer were not allowed sufficient time to make the necessary calculations, and to adjust his capital, according to the probable average of future importation prices. It will scarcely be denied, that the time for a total repeal might be so deferred, as to prevent even the slightest effect upon the actual price of corn. The business is not so urgent, at least, if our speculations be correct—as to preclude the possibility of giving time to any extent that might be deemed advisable. If it were possible to approach so gradually to a system of perfect freedom, that the annual loss to the farmer, in consequence of the transfer of capital, would be balanced by his annual gain, from the concomitant rise in the profits on his remaining stock; that would be the course which a wise government would elect to follow. Such a plan, it is true, is one of mere ideal perfection. But we may approximate to what we cannot wholly accomplish. The importation of foreign corn may be regulated with a view to that effect. Prices may be suffered to decline without too rapid a precipitancy; advantage may be taken of any accident, to break the fall—the occurrence of a glut, for instance, from over-production, might be laid hold of for the purpose of accelerating the consummation, and we might thus, perhaps, accomplish the business without any very serious loss to any party.

But if the agricultural interests are entitled to time, in the process of repealing the Corn Laws, it is no less expedient in the case of a free trade in corn, to establish a permanent counterpoise against the pressure of certain taxes on the soil, such as tithes, a portion of the poor rates, and perhaps one or two other taxes. It seems too obvious to be remarked, that commodities in importing countries, will be sold at that price which remunerates, not the home, but the foreign producer. If a Polish farmer could sell his wheat in Mark Lane at 40 shillings a quarter, and no restraint were imposed on importation, the English farmer must be content to sell his wheat of the same quality, at the same price. If this occurred in the natural course of things, 40 shillings per quarter would be the lowest rate at which such wheat could possibly be supplied; and as we should then derive from the capital employed in agriculture the greatest sum of production, which it would be capable of yielding, no cause of complaint would exist, either on the part of the consumers or the landlords—the only classes whose interests are permanently affected by any legislative regulation about the corn-trade. But English corn would, in fact, be brought into the market under very unfavourable circumstances: under the pressure of taxes which probably amount together to one-tenth of its whole value. To compete with the Polish exporter, the English farmer must restrict himself to the cultivation of such soils as would enable him to pay tithes and the rest of the agricultural taxes, and still sell his wheat at 40s. per quarter. This would, in effect, transfer the burden of the tithe and agricultural taxes from the English consumer to the landlord; for rent, as we have seen, increases and declines in proportion to the increase or contraction of cultivation. Hence, therefore, the necessity of a protecting duty to the amount proposed.

Against an arrangement holding out such advantages to the agricultural classes, the rest of the community would have no cause to complain; an assertion which to those, who have read the preceding pages of this essay, will need no evidence. There is, however, one argument, we think a fallacious one, although frequently adduced by the adversaries of the Corn Laws in the House of Commons, which deserves some notice in this place. It is, that the existence of the Corn Laws is, or ought to be, a bar to the removal of restriction on other branches of our foreign commerce.

"How is it possible," says Mr. Maberly, "that our manufacturers should long be able to contend with the manufacturers supplied by the cheaper labour of the continent, while the high duties on imported corn are kept at their present standard? Ministers should have paused before they ventured upon adopting their new regulations in respect of our trade and manufactures. They should have considered our Corn Laws in the first place, before they took any other steps in regard to our commerce*."

Now it may be true that the most desirable point, from which a liberal system of trade could have started, would have been a repeal of the Corn Laws; but it is not true, that relaxations in other branches of our old commercial system are unsafe, during the continuance of these laws; it is not necessarily true, that because labour is dear in England as compared with other countries in Europe, that those countries should be able to compete with us in manufactures. This argument is built on a wrong notion of what determines a country to export. Exportation takes place from England rather than France, not because wages are lower (for, in fact, they are higher) but because the whole cost of the exported commodities in England is less than their whole cost in France. Of the cost of production, wages are only a part; by those who insist upon the argument we are disputing, they seem to be considered as the whole. Suppose that in the manufacture of a given article labour must be expended which cost 90*l.* in England, and 85*l.* in France; does it follow that the United States will purchase that article in France? By no means; for if the rate of profit in France should be 15*l.* per cent., while it is only 9 per cent. in England, the English manufacturer will still be able to undersell his French competitor; he will be able to sell the article in question for 99*l.*, whilst the Frenchman cannot profitably export it for less than 100*l.* So long, in fact, as the English manufacturer can afford to sell his commodities at a lower rate than the French, so long will he command the foreign market: for the same reason, also, and under the same circumstances, he will retain his superiority in the home market.

So far, indeed, is Mr. Maberly's notion concerning the effect of the rate of wages on the power of a country to export manufactured goods from being correct, that it is directly the reverse. It is true that the high rate of wages in England is the cause of a low rate of profit; and in that respect, undoubtedly, high wages are injurious to the manufacturer: in that respect, also, in common with other capitalists, the manufacturer may justly complain of the Corn Laws. But low profits, so far from disabling him for competing with the foreign manufacturer, have precisely the opposite effect. It is by the lowness of his profits—in other words by the high wages of English labour—that our manufacturers have been able to undersell their foreign competitors in every market in the world.

It is well known that the manufactures in which this country principally excels, are chiefly the produce of machinery, or, to speak in the language of the political economists, of fixed capital. But the value of the produce of fixed capital is mainly composed of profits. Not to embarrass the question, we will suppose it to consist of profits only. Suppose, then, that a French and English manufacturer are each in possession of a machine of the value of 1000*l.* If the rate of profit in France be 15 per cent., the cost, or, in other words, the price of the commodity produced by the French machine, will be 150*l.* If the rate of profit in England be only 9 per cent., the price of the English article will be 90*l.* But what causes the comparative cheapness of the English article? The comparative lowness of profits. The profits of fixed capital, however, must correspond with the general rate; and the regulator of the general rate of profits is the cost of labour. Profits are high when wages are low; and low, when wages are high. But the English commodity, as we have seen, is cheaper than the French, because profits in England, as compared with profits in France, are low; in other words, because wages in England are high.

If this proposition be true—and in our eyes it bears the aspect of mathematical precision—the existence of the Corn Laws afford no argument in favour of perpetuating the restraints on other branches of trade and commerce.

Having pursued the subject thus far, we are now more able to judge of the futility of the objection to a further change in the Corn Laws, which is founded on the unfitness of the time—an objection repeated so frequently in the course of last year's debates, as to render particular citations needless.

If we were inclined to play the part of advocates, we might observe that the gentlemen who oppose alteration now, on account of the flourishing condition of agriculture, were the same who demanded more complete prohibitions in the late periods of distress. Their argument, therefore, goes the length of demanding a perpetual prohibition. We should, however, be sorry to resort to this dishonest argument ad hominem; we will leave Mr. Gooch to justify his personal inconsistency, and debate the question on its merits. A change, then, must be commenced, either in a period of distress or in one of prosperity. If in a period of distress, we may regard the consequences as affecting two sets of agriculturists:—those who are driven from their occupations, and those whose losses fall something short of that acme of distress, and who are still able to carry on their business. A repeal of the Corn Laws at such a time—and the depression may be so great that prices would sink no lower even from their total repeal—would confirm the loss of both parties; a continuance of those laws, would, in time, enable the occupiers who had not been driven from their trade, to retrieve their condition in a great degree; but the rest would be ruined past redemption.

What is said of the occupiers, is also true of the owners of land. Now it seems past questioning, to our minds, that a juncture like that we have described, affords the best possible opportunity for a repeal. In the first place, the repeal might be complete; in the next, the remediable mischief would be less than at any other period. To the ruined occupiers, the repeal would be simply indifferent; the loss would be confined to those who might still be able to retain their occupations, and who would be deprived of the opportunity of retrieving their ruined fortunes. But is the public advantage an insufficient set-off against such an interest?—an interest, too, conferring no permanent advantage, but which would only restore the farmer to the old state of temporary prosperity and periodical loss? To us, we confess, this appears the “acceptable time;” although we are far from averse to begin a system of repeal at a period of prosperity. In that case we have only to observe that the sooner it is begun the better; for the higher the rise in agricultural prices, the more impracticable will such a system become; the mischief will attain more inveteracy, and the evils which follow in its train will assume their most incurable type.

Entertaining these opinions, we look with anxious concern to the ensuing deliberations in parliament. With a ministry both zealous and instructed, and a large portion of the respectable classes well inclined to a modification of the Corn Laws, it might be thought that there would be but little room for apprehension. But neither of these parties are arbiters in the case. The power is in the hands of that party whose advantage is unfortunately so opposed to that of the community—although, if not considered in a bare pecuniary light, it is less opposed than might at first appear—and, however we may rely on the enlightened integrity of a portion of that body, we find little to hope for in the mass.

We judge from the principles of human nature; from their habitual conduct; from their confessions; from their threats. “The men of landed property,” says Lord Enniskillen, “ought to stand by one another. If they do not, the monied interest will overwhelm them* :” as if this were a civil war between the partizans of high profits and high rents, and the only question for the legislature, were to secure a victory for the landed interest! This sentiment was repeatedly expressed in many speeches, most of which, we are happy to observe, were not distinguished, either for their intrinsic merit, or the reputation of their authors.

* Ibid., p. 401.

But this monstrous ground has been taken by one individual of grave character and eminent legal attainments, whose opinions it is impossible to slight and absurd to ridicule. We speak of the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Lord Redesdale.

"The constitution of this country," he says, "is founded upon, and can never be safely separated from, the landed interest. To talk, therefore, of a free trade in corn, is at once absurd and dangerous. It is impossible that such a free trade can ever exist consistently with the safety and prosperity of the kingdom. . . . Any measure would be objectionable which might have the effect of placing the corn-trade of England upon the same footing as that of any foreign country. To do this would be to adopt a false and dangerous policy, and one which is opposed to the soundest maxims of national economy. The land is the foundation of all our wealth, and from it every other description of advantage flows. This has been the idea entertained by all our old writers on political economy, and experience has proved that they were not mistaken."

What is chiefly to be remarked in this extract, with regard to the man, is the strange contrast it presents with his judgments in the Irish Court of Chancery—the contrast between strength and weakness, knowledge and ignorance, and each equally profound—the miracle of hearing from the same lips acute and lucid argument, and the babbling anilities which the reader has just perused. What is chiefly to be noticed in the opinions—and with them we have most concern—is the new light which Lord Redesdale has thrown on the theory of the British Constitution. The basis of the government he has found in the landed aristocracy: the fact has been long suspected, but it required the oak and triple brass round the breast of this noble lawyer to avow the system in terms, and stamp it with his public sanction. This busy meddling period is an ill time for such candid disclosures. Not to mention the mass of temporary taxation incurred, in defence of "the mixed government," we have now a second permanent prop in the shape of another corn-tax. The people have long murmured against the title; they are consoled with the prospect of a perpetual corn-law. Such is the account:

	Per Ann.
Tithe (say) . . . . .	£ 5,000,000
Corn laws (say) . . . . .	15,000,000
Total yearly charge for the benefits of a constitu- tional clergy and landed gentry . . . . .	£20,000,000

This will never bear investigation. Men will suffer any finite evils, rather than incur the hazard or inflict the misery of shaking them at once from their shoulders; but perpetuity is an element in pain, which makes even "the wise man mad." We harbour no inveteracy against the landed gentry; we have no hostile feelings against any class or party: we wish to see all prosper without sacrificing any single interest. Any relief which may be afforded to the landlords, consistently with the general good—and we have shewn how great the measure of that relief may be—we are heartily willing to concede. But when they attempt to justify the peculiar privileges, which their power has enabled them to usurp, we cannot refrain from advising them—and it is an act not of enmity but friendship—to be wise in time.

Country Banks.

A PETITION, presented by Mr. Hume, on behalf of a Mr. Jones, complaining of the misconduct of a country banker in refusing to cash his five pound notes, produced a short discussion on the currency. This debate is worthy of notice, both as indicating the state of the political economy of parliament, and in consequence of an intimation from several members that they intended to move the subject in the ensuing session.

To these members we offer the following concise reflections.

We may perhaps be pardoned for observing that, when a thing is to be bought, it cannot be bought too cheap. If, for instance, of two media of circulation, gold and paper (for we will keep the silver out of view), the prime cost of one be twenty million, and of the other but a few thousand pounds, no man, who can "count ten upon his fingers," will as far as cost is concerned, elect the gold in preference to the paper. Now, if the manufacture of a paper note be estimated at so high a price as 3d. a paper currency might still be had for one-eightieth of the cost of a gold one. That being the case, we must hear something much more decisive than any hon. gentleman has been able to borrow from Mr. Cobbett, before we can abandon our maxim, in favour of a metallic currency.

Suppose, for the sake of argument, the circulation of the country to be £20,000,000*, what can be plainer than that the same amount of paper notes, if gold remain of the same value and the notes of the same quantity, will serve equally well for almost all, and better for many purposes than the gold? If with a paper sovereign or a gold one, I can indifferently purchase 20 shillings, or a commodity of 20 shillings' worth, how am I concerned in the choice of gold or paper, otherwise than in the greater convenience of lightness, pliability, and the like, which the one may possess above the other? That the paper may be made to purchase as much as the gold sovereign, is demonstrable. To communicate that faculty to paper money, nothing more is necessary to be done, than to make it convertible into gold on demand.

When a merchant or a country gentleman pays a debt with his note of hand, why does the creditor receive the note in lieu of its worth in money? For the obvious reason, that money or money's worth may be had for it at the stipulated notice. For the same reason would that merchant or country gentleman rest content with a note of the Bank of England.

If the merchant, however, or the country gentleman, should put forth in payment of their debts more notes than their funds would answer; or if the Bank of England should commit the same imprudence—the merchant, the squire, and the Bank, would find their notes depreciated in value, till at a certain point they would cease to circulate at all. The merchant and the squire must take the benefit of the Insolvent Debtor's Act, and the Bank of a parliamentary indemnity.

Thus we find that individuals, with the exception of a few, who are either knavish or imbecile, are deterred from over-issuing their bills by the dread of a call for payment. Within the extent to which their funds are adequate, there is nothing but advantage from the practice of issuing bills. That the same check would regulate the Bank issues would be a matter of little doubt, if the Government were so responsible to the people, that the Bank would never calculate on a suspension of their liability to pay in cash. The interest of a body of men is not so apt to be misconceived as an individual's. The conduct of an individual is regulated by his own wit or folly; that of a corporation by the most experienced heads amongst them. On this account it is almost certain that a body like the Bank, if entirely unprotected by the Government, could never, either wilfully, or ignorantly, put forth their promises to pay beyond their means of redeeming them.

If, however, we should grant it to be possible, the remedy is both simple and certain. Suppose, to avoid large numbers, that the currency is 1,000,000 of notes circulating with, and of course exchanging for, the same number of sovereigns. If the paper issues be increased by 100,000, the relative values of gold and paper are altered. The note remaining at 20, the sovereign would rise to 22 silver shillings. In this case nothing would prevent a demand for payment of the notes till they were reduced to their former quantity; as on every note so cashed the holder would gain, and the issuers would lose 2s., the difference between gold and paper.

The interest of the issuers would equally protect a paper currency from a disturbance of an opposite kind; an inconvenient narrowing of the circulation. Nothing but a caprice, which in the most ignorant individual would be set down as a loss of reason, and which a body of individuals may be presumed incapable of entertaining, could induce the issuers so far to restrict their paper. With the quantity of paper, which their credit enables them to send abroad, their profits are increased or lessened. The temptation to which they are exposed, is, in fact, of an opposite kind; their propensity is always to over-issue, and not to stint the supply of notes. But suppose them so capricious, as of two rates of profit to elect the least, the public would suffer little from the consequent rise in the value of the circulating medium. If, instead of 1,000,000, they only issued 900,000 notes, and the value of the note and sovereign should thereupon rise from 20s. to 11. 1s. 0½d. (nearly), the bullion-merchants, who would infallibly retain the ordinary propensity for high profits, would carry their gold to the mint for the sake of the 1s. 0½d. which they would gain on every sovereign they coined, till they had sent 100,000 into circulation, and brought down the value of the currency to its original mark, by restoring its due amount.

* This is the estimate of Messrs. Whitmore (Appendix, Bullion Report, p. 121, 8vo. ed.) and Harman (Commons' Report, 1819, Minutes of Evidence, p. 40), of the amount of gold coins in circulation during the three years previous to 1797;—an estimate generally thought to be under-rated.

Such a company as we have described, may the Bank of England be considered, in the present state of the law. Let us not be understood as vindicating that establishment from the numerous charges that have been urged, and justly urged, against it. It is not our present business to enter into that discussion. We have laid down the preceding principles for a particular object, and shall apply them at present to no other. Extensive as the improvements are of which the national currency is susceptible, the community, in lieu of a better, are still benefitted by the circulation of Bank of England paper. The amount to which they are benefitted is co-extensive with the amount of capital let loose from the office of circulation to be employed in productive uses. The real object of regret is the restriction of Bank paper to so high a sum as 5l.: for we fully concur in the opinion "that a currency is in its most perfect state, when "it consists wholly of paper money of "an equal value with the gold it professes "to represent."

A brief application of these principles will throw light on the merits of the debate on Mr. Jones's petition. We assume, what is at present the fact, that Bank-notes are exchangeable for gold on demand. So it seems are the notes of country bankers; and we contend, in opposition to the supporters of Mr. Jones's petition, that so long as Bank paper is thus convertible, not only is it indifferent whether country notes be convertible into gold or not; but it would be better that payment of those notes should only be demandable in Bank paper*. On this account we are at a loss to conceive why Mr. Huskisson should plume himself on "resisting the attempt" of the country bankers to introduce a clause into Mr. Peel's bill, enabling them to cash their paper in notes of the Bank of England instead of gold. A really convertible Bank paper is for all purposes as good as gold; by all, but its issuers, it ought to be a legal tender, and, unless the public convenience must be sacrificed to individual whims, no reason can be alleged why any portion of the capital of the country should be locked up in sovereigns, instead of serving the offices of production, in the various departments to which public necessity may call them. If private persons will indulge in such caprices, it is but fair that they should pay for them. As soon as country bankers shall have ascertained the average supply of cash, which the freaks of individuals may require, there is no doubt but gold will be forthcoming on payment of an adequate consideration to meet their demands. To gentlemen who prefer gold to paper, half-a-crown or five shillings per centum would not seem an extravagant charge for so great an indulgence. This rate would, of course, suppose a much larger number of virtuosos than exist in practice; if the rate should rise to 5l. per centum, even that could not be deemed too high a price for the honour such persons enjoy of possessing so different a taste from the rest of the human race.

We cannot feel Mr. Hume's objection, that convertibility of country notes into Bank paper only would tend to produce an over-currency, and a consequent disorder in the money transactions of the country. This objection would be valid, if Bank paper itself were inconvertible; but whilst the Bank is liable to pay in gold, the evil cannot occur. By over-currency, Mr. Hume must mean such an issue of paper as shall reduce its value below that of gold. If country paper can be issued to that extent, without reducing the value of Bank paper, its depreciation will be as certainly remedied by its convertibility into Bank paper as into gold. If, however the over-issue and consequent fall of country paper be accompanied by a corresponding fall in the paper of the Bank of England—what will be the consequence? The Bank notes will be presented for gold, till their quantity be so diminished as to equalize their value with that of the precious metal—which brings us to the former case.

* From the circumstance of the Bank of England paper being confined to notes of 5l. and upwards, it is obvious, that whatever may be the legal liability of country bankers to pay their own notes in gold, they are to all intents liable in fact. To compel them to pay their notes in gold, the holders of their notes have only to present them for payment, in any number less than five at a time.

But we are told by Mr. Hume and others, that the quantity of country paper is so great, that “no gold can be got in the country” at all. So much the better. Who wants it? Of what use is it? How should we be the better if we had it? We know of but one case worth mentioning, in which gold can be preferable to Bank paper; and that is, when the issuers of paper become so blind to the suggestions of interest, as to send it forth in too great abundance. When a sovereign, worth 20s., can be had at the Bank for a note which may be got for 18s.—when the paper is too abundant by one-tenth, a sovereign is better than a note by 2s. exactly.

We have already intimated our dissatisfaction with the Establishment of “The Governor and Company of the Bank of England;” we are also anxious that our remarks may not be misconstrued into an approval of the system of Country Banks. It has not been our business, on this occasion, to discuss the merits of either system, but to ascertain the policy by which things, as they are, may be rendered most conducive to the public service.

The only point remaining to be noticed, is Lord Folkestone’s dismal account of the hazard, expense, and dilatoriness of the legal process, which the holder of a country note must have recourse to, to get it cashed by a refractory banker. Summary process, as we have shewn elsewhere, is by no means unpalatable to our taste; but in exposing the difficulties of exchanging a note for a sovereign, Lord Folkestone has only described the obstacles which lie in the way of justice, whenever and for whatever cause it is sought for in an action at law.

The foregoing remarks were written shortly after the debate took place, to which they are appended.

We have lately witnessed a series of failures amongst the London and country bankers, which may be supposed to have modified the opinion expressed above. A moment’s consideration, however, will shew, that the circumstances were in no degree calculated to affect our previous opinion; and were, in fact, altogether unconnected with the grounds upon which it had been formed. The late failures prove, and prove beyond all doubt, that the system of country banking in England is essentially bad. We are so far from denying this, that we not only cautioned the reader against misinterpreting our remarks on the impolicy of compelling country bankers to pay their notes in gold, so long as we should possess a convertible Bank of England paper, into an approval of that system; but it has met the constant reprobation of those eminent writers whose opinions form the basis of most of the economical reasonings in the present work.

It was not, however, our business to enter into the merits of that system. We contended, and still contend, that so long as Bank paper shall remain on its present footing, the holder of the country note will be armed with no additional security by a liability on the part of the country banker to pay in gold, nor will the public be protected against the over-issues of provincial notes; whilst a large portion of the general capital must remain inert in the shape of the precious metal. There was nothing in the late occurrences to disprove this proposition. Those who held the notes of country bankers suspected of insolvency, were well satisfied if they could get Bank paper in exchange, and never dreamed of asking for gold.—The notes of the Bank of England passed as currently during the time of the panic as gold or silver, and experienced no loss of confidence. These events, therefore, may prove the insecurity of allowing so large a portion of the currency to be supplied by individuals, or small companies, consisting of at most five partners; but they leave the question as to the inutility of compelling country bankers to pay in gold altogether untouched. We see, therefore, nothing in those circumstances which should induce us to alter a single line of what we have advanced above, with respect to Mr. Hume’s petition.

Having touched upon this subject, we may conclude by expressing a hope, that the late distresses will be duly applied for the purpose of exposing the enormous evils resulting from the monopoly of the Bank of England. So long as that monopoly shall exist, it is impossible to make any effective change in the system of provincial banking.

Joint Stock Companies.

I. A TRADE, or a particular trading enterprise, may be of such a nature, that a solitary individual, or a few individuals in partnership, would not, probably, undertake it, or would not undertake and conduct it with the greatest possible advantage to the community at large. For, first, it might be physically impossible to carry it on, without a larger capital than a solitary individual, or a small body of individuals, can commonly command. Secondly, a capital embarked in it might be put to unusual hazard. Thirdly, the return to an extensive capital would be proportionally, as well as absolutely, larger than the return to a moderate or a small one: in other words, the commodity or service, to be produced or rendered, might be provided, with an extensive capital, at a smaller cost. On the first and second of these suppositions, the trade or enterprise, though certainly or probably advantageous to the community, would hardly be undertaken by a solitary individual, or by a few individuals in partnership. On the last, individuals would engage in the trade, singly, or in limited partnerships (unless it were likely that they would be encountered in the market by more extensive associations); but they would not undertake and conduct it with the greatest possible advantage to the community at large.

On any of these suppositions, the establishment of large trading associations (call them extensive partnerships, or call them joint stock companies) would be advantageous to the public. On the first or second supposition, the commodity or service would not be provided at all, by any but joint stock companies. On the last supposition, it would not be provided by any but joint stock companies, at the smallest possible cost, and for the smallest possible price.

II. 1. The extent to which joint stock companies will be established, must be more or less affected by the law of partnership; especially by that portion of it, which regards the obligation of the individual partner to satisfy the obligations of the body. By the general law of partnership which obtains in England, every partner is liable for all the debts and engagements of the body, not only to the extent of his interest in the joint stock, but also to the whole extent of his separate property. As between the partners themselves, the extent to which each is liable, is limited by express agreement, or by the contract which the relation implies; but as between himself and strangers to the society, each of the partners is liable without limitation, unless they be exempted by privilege from the obligation imposed by the law. A privilege exempting the partners from this general obligation, may be granted by the supreme, or by a subordinate, legislature; by Parliament or by the Crown. If a partnership be incorporated by charter, each partner is merely liable to the extent of his share or interest in the stock of the society. Such, at least, was the necessary consequence of a charter of incorporation, before the close of the last session of Parliament. At present, the Crown is empowered to grant charters of incorporation, by which the members of the corporate bodies may be made individually liable, to such extent, and subject to such regulations and restrictions as the Crown (or rather, the advisers of the Crown) may deem expedient*. If a partnership be privileged by Act of Parliament, the extent to which the partners are made individually liable, depends, of course, upon the discretion of the legislature. It may be made a corporation, strictly so called; and then each member is merely liable to the extent of his interest in the corporate property: or being simply relieved from certain technical difficulties, which would otherwise lie in its way, when it attempted to recover its debts, it may be left subject, in all other respects, to the obligations imposed upon partners, by the general law of partnership. Such, it would seem, is the amount of the privilege, when a company is merely empowered to sue by some officer, or servant.

2. In France, anonymous partnerships (which closely resemble such of our trading companies as are corporations, strictly so called) are not legally constituted, unless their establishment be specially authorized by the King. But trading partnerships may be constituted, either en nom collectif, or en commandite, at the discretion of the interested parties. A partnership is denominated a partnership en nom collectif, when every partner, as between himself and strangers to the society, is liable without limitation for all its debts and engagements. It takes the name of a partnership en commandite, when it subsists between one or more partners liable without limitation (associés responsables et solidaires), and one or more partners liable to a limited extent (commanditaires ou associés en commandite). If there be more than one partner liable without limitation, the partnership, is, at one and the same time, a partnership en nom collectif, as to the two or more who are so liable, and a partnership en commandite, as to those whose liability is qualified.

A commanditaire, or partner en commandite, is not liable to creditors or other claimants upon the society, beyond the amount of the capital which he has contributed, or engaged to contribute, to the joint stock. On the other hand, he is prohibited from acting for the partnership in its dealings with third persons. Its trade or business is exclusively conducted, in the name or names, and by, or under the control of, one or more of the partners, who are liable without limitation. The name of a commanditaire is not permitted to appear in the name or firm of the society; and if he engage or intermeddle in any dealing with strangers, either in his character of partner, or as agent of the partners who are liable without limitation, he instantly loses his immunity, and is thenceforth responsible, to the same unlimited extent, for the partnership debts and engagements.

We have seen that a commanditaire is prohibited from acting for the partnership in its dealings with third persons. It would also appear, that he is not directly liable to any third person having a claim upon the society, even to the extent of the capital which, by contract with the partner responsible in solido, he engaged to contribute to the joint stock. The debts and engagements of the partnership are exclusively contracted by, or in the name of the partner responsible in solido; and so long as he is solvent, the creditors or other claimants upon it must look to him alone for satisfaction. If the commanditaire has not advanced the capital which he engaged to contribute, he may be compelled to advance it by the partner responsible in solido, and may thus indirectly satisfy the partnership obligations. But, directly, the creditors or other claimants have no remedy against him, unless the partner responsible in solido become bankrupt; on which event, the joint stock (including the debts due to it) and the separate estate of the bankrupt partner

(subject to such prior claims as his separate creditors may have upon it) are applied in satisfaction of the partnership obligations, so far as they are required for the purpose, or will extend to answer it. Now, on that event, the joint stock, together with the separate estate applicable to the purpose, may be, and probably will be, insufficient to satisfy the obligations of the society. In this case, if the commanditaire has advanced the capital which he engaged to contribute, and has not taken money or money's worth from the joint stock, the whole of that capital, as forming a part of that stock, is applied in liquidation of those obligations; but there his liability ends. In the same case, if he has not advanced capital in pursuance of his engagement, or has taken money or money's worth, he is a debtor to the joint stock, to the whole extent of what he has taken, and of what he has failed to advance; and the assignees in bankruptcy, or such other persons as represent the claimants upon the partnership, may proceed against him for this debt, as against any other debtor to the partnership estate. We have presumed that he is liable to account for whatever he has taken from the joint stock, even as his share of foregone profits; for he is obliged to bear the losses of the partnership, to the extent of the capital, which he has contributed, or is bound to contribute (jusqu'à concurrence des fonds qu'il a mis ou dû mettre dans la société): the terms of which obligation would not, it should seem, be satisfied, if he were not compellable to refund.—It may happen that the joint stock, together with the separate estate, applicable to the purpose, are more than sufficient to satisfy the obligations of the society. In that case, the partner en commandite (who is a creditor of the partner responsible in solido, though a debtor to the creditors of the partnership) may resort to the joint stock and the separate estate, for whatever was due to him at the bankruptcy, or the assignees have obliged him to pay: but not in competition with creditors who are not also partners. In favour of their paramount claims, he is excluded from the fund, till they are satisfied to the uttermost farthing.

Finally, the formation of the partnership must be evidenced by instrument in writing; and an extract of that instrument (containing, amongst other things, the name or names of the partner or partners responsible in solido, and the sum total of the capitals contributed or to be contributed en commandite) must immediately be inserted in a public register, and posted up for a certain period thereafter in a place of common resort*.—It appears to us, that the security of the claimants upon the partnership would be more complete, and that it would inspire more confidence into such third persons as it might seek to deal with, if the names of the commanditaires, and the extent to which each was liable, were also denoted by the extract.

III. 1. Though the formal constitution of a joint stock company may invest the body of its members with powers of superintendence and control, in practice they are inevitably passive. They contribute capital, and receive accruing profits, in proportion to their respective interests; but the conduct of the enterprise is abandoned to a few of the partners, or delegated to hired agents. These acting partners, or agents, represent the company in its dealings with strangers; and each of its members is liable, to a limited or unlimited extent, for the debts and engagements which they may contract on its behalf. The company, or the great and passive majority of its members, must trust to their honesty and discretion; for there is little security, besides, that they will not abuse their power of binding their constituents. If a member of the constituent body be liable without limitation, 'every acre that he owns, and every shilling that he is worth,' are staked upon the conduct of his representatives. He is responsible to that formidable extent, for debts and engagements which may be contracted without his approbation. The claimants may resort to him for satisfaction of their demands; and though each of his partners be liable for a proportion of the loss, he may, practically, be unable to obtain the contributions to which he is legally entitled.

The rule, therefore, of the English law, must sometimes prevent undertakings which would benefit the adventurers and the public. The prospect of unlimited liability for obligations contracted by others, is enough to discourage a cautious man from adventuring in a joint enterprise. The project may be well imagined, well considered, and likely to succeed: but still he might lose his all by the misconduct of the managers; and the mere chance of incurring this fearful evil, outweighs the probability of gain. Compared with this rule of the existing law, the mysterious terrors of the unintelligible Bubble Act were a feeble obstacle to the establishment of joint stock companies. Any man will see that such is the tendency of the rule, if he look to the common course of human affairs, instead of attending exclusively to the incidents of the passing hour.

For this reason, and for reasons which will appear hereafter, we strongly incline to think that the rule should be abolished, and that such a change should be made in the general law of partnership, as would enable partners to limit their liability to creditors, without the special sanction of parliament or the Crown.

The admission of partnerships en commandite, is the specific change which we venture to suggest; and that, for reasons which will also appear in the sequel.

A joint stock company constituted en commandite, would consist of a partner, or of a few partners, acting and responsible in solido, and of a numerous body of partners who contributed capital merely, and were liable to a limited extent. The acting partner, or partners, would manage the trade, or enterprise, at his or their discretion, accounting to the rest of the company for the application of the partnership funds, and distributing accruing profits in the proportions and manner agreed upon.

2. If the rule of the Law of Partnership sometimes prevents undertakings which would benefit the adventurers and the public; if the evil be corrected, imperfectly, by the special and occasional interference of Parliament or the Crown; and if the change which we have ventured to suggest would not be followed by greater or equal evil, the expediency of the change is proved. The first of these propositions may be assumed. The second and the third we shall attempt to demonstrate in the course of the ensuing argument. In our attempt to demonstrate the last, we shall endeavour to establish the following subordinate propositions, though not precisely in the following order.

The persons whose interests might be affected by the change, may be classed thus:

* See Les Cinq Centes, avec Notes et Trajets, par J. B. Sirey (à Paris, 1819), pp. 161, 284, 626, et seq.

Members, or persons thinking to become members, of joint stock companies: solitary traders or limited partnerships, rivals of such companies in trade: creditors of partnerships constituted en commandite: the community at large. We shall accordingly endeavour to establish,—That though the rule were abolished, and the discouragement which it holds out were withdrawn, persons thinking to adventure in extensive joint enterprises would not engage in enterprises not advantageous to themselves: More briefly, that the rule is unnecessary as a check upon improvident speculation:—That enterprises advantageous to the adventurers, are also advantageous to the public; and that for this, coupled with the preceding reason, a change removing the discouragement would be generally useful:—That creditors of companies constituted en commandite would be less, or not more, obnoxious to loss and disappointment than creditors of companies constituted in the ordinary manner:—That though the rule were abolished, and the discouragement were withdrawn, joint stock companies would not be set on foot in opposition to solitary traders, unless they could provide the commodities or services with greater advantage to the community.

Such is the general purport of the ensuing argument; though various topics, which we think it unnecessary to announce, will be adverted to as we proceed.

Before we proceed, we must interpose the following caution. If the rights of strangers stand in the way of an enterprise, and they are either incompetent or unwilling to cede those rights, the enterprise cannot be accomplished without special legislative sanction. For instance, a project for cutting a canal may require an Act of Parliament, inasmuch as it would traverse the lands of proprietors who refuse to relinquish their property. To enterprises of this class, the ensuing argument will not apply, or must be applied with limitations. We shall touch upon such enterprises at the end of our essay*: But, in the meantime, we must be considered as contemplating trades or enterprises, which companies can carry on without special sanction (subject to the obligations imposed by the general law).

With this caution we proceed: endeavouring to establish, in the next section, that the rule is unnecessary as a check upon improvident speculation; and that a change removing the discouragement would be useful to the community at large.

IV. 1. Trading with a large capital is subject to disadvantages, certain and contingent, from which trading with a small capital is commonly exempt. In addition to these general disadvantages of trading with a large capital, trading in an extensive partnership (whether it be constituted in the ordinary manner, or en commandite, or as a corporate company) is subject to disadvantages of its own. The individual who trades with a small or a moderate capital, is not constrained to limit his attention to the general conduct of his trade, but may look to its minutest details. The individual trading with a large capital, must abandon details to the direction or superintendence of servants: the payment of whose wages is a great and certain disadvantage; who may be honest, skilful, diligent and frugal, but to whose frauds, or mistakes, or negligence, or habitual disregard of small savings, he is obnoxious. The large details of an extensive joint enterprise must also be abandoned to the direction or superintendence of servants and the members; or the majority of the members, of the joint stock company, are subject moreover to disadvantages which the individual trader may avoid. The individual trader, though he trade with a large capital, may keep the general conduct of his trade in his own hands. The general conduct of the extensive joint enterprise must be delegated to servants, or to one or a few of the partners: on the first of which suppositions, the whole company, and on the second, the great and passive majority of its members, are subject to the disadvantages of agency management, in the general, as well as in the detailed, conduct of their affairs.

On either supposition, the persons to whom the general conduct is delegated must be rewarded for their services. If they be hired agents, by wages. If they be acting partners, by wages, under that name; or by what comes to the same thing, larger shares in the profits of the enterprise, than they would otherwise receive upon the capitals which they contribute to the joint stock. Let the company be constituted as it may, this disadvantage is inevitable. The contingent disadvantages which are peculiar to trading in a company may be more affected by its constitution.

Setting aside the singularities of individual cases, the persons to whom the general conduct is delegated will probably conduct the enterprise with more or less of benefit to the company, as they are more or less responsible for its debts and engagements, and more or less exempted from the intermeddling of their principals or copartners. In these respects, the constitution of the partnership en commandite is so excellent, that if the adventurers in any extensive enterprise could form themselves into a company at their own discretion, either on that scheme, or in the ordinary way, or on the model of a trading corporation, they would probably pitch upon the first as presenting the fewest disadvantages. For if a partnership be constituted en commandite, its responsible members are liable to creditors to the whole extent of their means; and, unless they become bankrupt, exclusively liable. Consequently, they cannot mismanage the business confided to their care, or contract engagements unduly on the partnership account, without great, certain, and immediate evil to themselves. But if the partnership were formed on the model of a corporate company, these acting members would be responsible to a limited extent. If it were formed in the ordinary way, creditors could resort, directly and indifferently, either to these acting members or to any of their numerous partners. If, instead of conducting the enterprise as acting members, they conducted it as hired agents, they would not be liable at all, or would be liable, indirectly, through a contract to indemnify their principals. Wherefore, speaking comparatively, the evil which their mismanagement might bring upon themselves, would be narrow, uncertain, or remote.

If the managers were liable to creditors, exclusively and to the largest extent, their partners would probably lose by interfering with the conduct of the enterprise. Having taken this highest security for diligence, fidelity, and care, the majority of the members would do wisely, if they simply obliged their deputies to render an account of their management, and to distribute accruing profits in the proportions and manner agreed upon. The enterprise has been committed to the acting partners by a numerous body; by some of this body their pretensions must have been examined; and the chances, therefore, are, that they have more of appropriate knowledge, or, in some way or other, are more fitted to conduct it, than any of their constituents. Besides, the body, or any select portion of the body (call it a Court of Directors, Committee, or what not), can only interfere by fits and starts. It is not their habitual occupation. The thread of the enterprise is not in their hands. Its course and circumstances are not fully present to their minds. By their desultory attempts to instruct and control they might thwart and embarrass their servants, but would not add a jot to their own security.

But though a joint stock company were constituted en commandite, still it would trade under a load of peculiar disadvantages. The load might be lightened, but it would not be removed. Let a joint stock company be constituted as it may, all, or nearly all, its members are inevitably subject to the disadvantages of agency management, in the general conduct of their business, and throughout its extensive details.

2. Their peculiar liability to internal dissension is another disadvantage of no small moment, whether such questions as may arise amongst them must be referred to a court of justice, or fall within the competence of some domestic tribunal, provided by the members for themselves. It has been said, that a court of equity will not compel partners to account to their copartners, without decreeing a dissolution of the partnership, a sale of such portion of its stock as may not consist of debts or money, and the distribution of the whole amongst the members, according to their respective interests. Nor can we perceive that any tribunal could often avoid this course, in case the litigant parties refused to adjust their differences. This destructive proceeding would not, indeed, be inevitable, if the defendants were merely required to account for their past management. But if the plaintiffs believed that there had been misconduct, they would of course suspect that there was, and would be, misconduct; and would probably call upon the court, at the outset of the cause, to save the partnership property from further misapplication. If the court entertained the motion, it might make an order, with a view to the dissolution of the partnership, or with a view to its indefinite continuance. In the first case, some officer of the court, or other stranger to the partnership, would be directed to receive its debts, to secure the rest of its property, and to close its pending transactions. In the second, the immediate management of its business must also be committed to a stranger, or left in the hands of the defendants, or intrusted to the plaintiffs. The order having been granted on evidence of their misconduct, the management could not be left in the hands of the defendants. It could not be intrusted to the plaintiffs; for the defendants would then be obnoxious to the same or a similar wrong. Till the end, then, of the suit (which, in such a matter, would scarcely be a short one), it would be committed to some stranger, without appropriate knowledge of the business; without interest, or with a transient and feeble interest, in its success; and whose ignorance and supineness would be almost as mischievous as the sinister activity of any of the litigant parties. But if the partners preferred this alternative to a friendly arrangement of their differences, their mutual distrust must be incurable; their enmity, inveterate. If their connexion survived the suit, the remnant of the partnership property, which had escaped the interim management, would soon be destroyed by their own. Any proceeding that the court might adopt would be followed by great evil to the parties; but it would best consult their interests by dissolving the partnership, and taking immediate order for the security of its debts and effects.

If, therefore, a court of justice interfere with the disputes of partners, it will certainly waste their property, and probably balk the purpose for which the partnership was formed. But if all partners be obnoxious to this evil, the members of a joint stock company are peculiarly exposed to it. Some of its many members must be fools: And by false suggestions and fabricated evidence, a single vindictive blockhead may bring down this ruin upon the heads of his numerous associates. At the very least, he may consume their time, distract their attention, and impede the business of the company, by repeated, though fruitless, litigation.

By the deed or articles of association, the members of a company might provide a tribunal for themselves. They might, for instance, agree, that differences amongst the partners, arising out of partnership matters, should be decided by a vote of the majority, or determined by arbitration. And a provision to either purpose (if it were binding upon the partners) might exclude a court of justice, or mitigate the evil of its interference. By decisions, however, of the English judges, a provision to the latter purpose is utterly inoperative: And we infer from the reasons in which those decisions are bottomed, that a provision to the former purpose would be just as ineffectual.

An award made, or a reference depending, is, it should seem, a sufficient bar to an action or suit by partners against copartners. But partners may sue copartners, at law or in equity, in spite of an agreement between the parties that their differences shall be determined by arbitration*. Of the reasons which are rendered in "our books" for this last-mentioned rule, the following stands foremost:—"Because, although a reference depending, or made and determined, "might be a bar, yet a mere agreement "to refer cannot oust the superior courts "of their general jurisdiction." Upon which it is natural to remark, that the reason is a bad one, and is badly applied. Is the interference of a court of justice useful or not? Till this question (which is not adverted to) be settled in the affirmative, it is impertinent to allege, "that "courts would be ousted of their jurisdiction, if the agreement were binding "on the parties." Besides, if the reason be a good reason for disregarding an agreement to refer, it is also a good reason for annulling an award, or for taking a pending reference from the hands of the arbitrators: since, in each of these cases, courts are ousted of their jurisdiction. The rule is deduced inconsistently, from a premise which is impertinent.—Having done with this luscious morsel of technical reasoning, we gladly turn to utility.

If a domestic tribunal, provided by a company for itself, could take cognizance of differences between the partners, and could determine without appeal, some of these differences might be decided hastily or partially. If there were no domestic tribunal competent to quell such disputes, the existence, or prosperity, of the whole body might be extinguished, or endangered, at any instant, by any of its members. There is evil on either side, but the greater evil lies on the last.—Nor is it extremely probable, that a tribunal of the company's appointment would decide less correctly than a regular court of justice. In some instances, it might be less impartial; but in all instances, its means of ascertaining the merits would be more complete. Courts are unequal to the complicated questions of fact (questions, for instance, of account) which are likely to arise between partners. The English Courts confess their incompetence by their daily practice. When a question of the kind is brought to trial, the parties are exhorted by the judge to refer the matter to arbitration. The litigants are first excruciated with the expenses and vexations of a suit, and are then commended to the irregular, but more efficient, justice, which, had they been wise, they would have resorted to at the outset of the contest.—Brought into juxtaposition with this practice of the English Courts, the rule above mentioned is sufficiently curious. An agreement to refer is not an answer to a suit; but parties, who have suffered the evils of a suit, are exhorted to refer the difference.

It may also be remarked, that the decisions of a tribunal, provided by a company for itself, would only affect persons who were parties to the provision, or persons who might be bound by it with as little inconvenience.

A man acquires his interest in the stock and profits of a company, in one of three ways. He acquires by some act to which he was a voluntary party, and by that act alone; or, partly, by some incident to which he was a stranger: On the last of which suppositions, he takes by gratuitous title; or he acquires for valuable consideration given to another purpose. For example, original members of a company, or those who afterwards become members by purchase or gift, acquire their interests in the first of these ways; legatees of a deceased member, in the second; creditors of a bankrupt member (by their representatives, the assignees), in the third.

A person, acquiring his interest in the first of these ways, might be bound, without inconvenience, by a tribunal of the company's providing. He acquired his interest of his own will merely, assenting to the provision, and looking to its probable consequences. Nothing can be plainer, than that a voluntary party to an agreement which is generally useful, should not be permitted to recede from it.—Though a person in the second predicament did not assent to the provision when his interest attached, he acquired gratuitously through a person who did. For obvious reasons, those who take gratuitously (heirs and devisees, for instance, as well as legatees) are generally bound by the obligations of their predecessors: and the general principle should be applied here, unless some special cause can be shewn to the contrary.

If a company were constituted en commandite, interests might be acquired in its stock and profits by creditors of three several classes: by separate creditors of partners en commandite; by separate creditors of partners responsible in solido; by creditors who had dealt with these last, as acting for, and representing the society.—Creditors of the third class would be creditors of the company as a body; and, for reasons which it is needless to assign, ought not to be obliged by its regulations.—Creditors of a partner en commandite would not be creditors of the company. Their debtor would have dealt with them, not on behalf of the company, but upon his private and separate account. They might come upon the partnership property for satisfaction of their debts, but only as creditors of the individual partner, and to the extent of his individual interest. Unhappily, however, for the rest of the members, his share in the partnership property would be blended with the bulk. The whole would be one mass, subject to the rights of numerous parties: And in order to define the portion to which his creditors might resort, it would be necessary to dissolve the partnership, and, in the language of the English Courts, to “wind up its concerns.” The consequences are obvious. If unjust pretensions were advanced by his creditors, and their claims could not be disposed of in a summary manner, the company might be destroyed. Though the company, as a body, were solvent, and even prosperous, it might be involved in questions with the creditors of any single shareholder, which would force it into a court of justice, and lead to its dissolution. The mischief, however, would be obviated, simply and without inconvenience, in case a provision to the following purport were inserted in the instrument of association, and were binding upon the separate creditors of the partners en commandite.—That if creditors of any such partner should resort to the partnership property, any of his copartners might satisfy their claims upon it, by paying them the amount of the capital which their debtor had contributed: And that after such payment, the interest of the debtor, and of all entitled under him, should vest in the partner by whom the satisfaction had been made. By the English law, provisions analogous to this, though made with the concurrence of the indebted partners, are void, as against their creditors*. It is manifest, nevertheless, that separate creditors might be bound by the provision, with great advantage to others, and without inconvenience to themselves. If it were binding, it might save a solvent and prosperous company from needless dissolution. The creditors of the company would be benefited; inasmuch as the interest, and, with the interest, the obligations of the debtor, would devolve from an insolvent, upon a solvent, proprietor. As a class, separate creditors would not be curtailed of their rights. In some instances, an arrear of profit might be due to the indebted partner, and his creditors might be deprived of it unjustly. But in others, the amount of the capital, which he had contributed to the joint stock, would exceed the value of his present interest. Speaking, therefore, generally, the value of his interest, as measured by the amount of his advances, would approach pretty closely to its actual worth. Besides, if his interest were ascertained by judicial process, the partnership property would be wasted. His share, as thus determined, might surpass his share, as measured by the amount of his advances; but the thing to be divided would be a wreck. The exquisite justice, which his creditors might obtain from the court, would be worse than the grossest injustice, which they might suffer at the hands of the company.—As against the separate creditors of the partners responsible in solido, a similar provision might be made, but would probably be useless. During their solvency, little inconvenience would arise to their constituents, though the joint stock in their possession, as well as their separate property, could be taken in execution by their separate creditors, as well as by the creditors of the company. So long as they were solvent, such an incident would scarcely happen. If such an incident did happen, they would probably be insolvent, and their bankruptcy would speedily ensue: On which event, the company would be dissolved of necessity; inasmuch as the joint stock, as well as the separate estates of the bankrupt partners, would be administered under the bankrupt laws.

There are certain difficulties, touching the necessary parties to suits, which arrest or retard the march of English justice, so often as the interested persons are unusually numerous. In this respect, the scrupulosity of the English Courts is pushed to pernicious excess: And the difficulties, when inherent in the subject, are always aggravated by their elaborate systems of procedure. We have therefore assumed, as yet, that these difficulties might be surmounted: that members of a company might sue and be sued with effect, in their contests amongst themselves. And proceeding on this assumption, we have shewn, or endeavoured to shew, that their differences would be better decided by a domestic tribunal, than by any of the regular courts.—Assuming that these difficulties are not to be surmounted, the members of every company would be excluded from justice, unless a tribunal of its own providing were competent to determine their disputes. A partner, or partners, might sue a copartner, or copartners; but the suit would be defective for want of the necessary parties. The applicants for justice would stick at the threshold of the court. The evils of litigation might be inflicted and suffered, but none of its fruits could be obtained. Debarred from the regular tribunals—without resort to a competent tribunal of their own,—the body of the company might be injured, with impunity, by any of its members. All would lie at the mercy of each.

A company, therefore, would be placed in the following dilemma, unless a tribu-

* Assignees under a separate commission are entitled specifically to the interest of the bankrupt partner; and no agreement made between the partners can prevent their right from attaching. Wilson v. Greenwood. 1 Swanston's Reports. For the mischiefs likely to arise from the claims of separate creditors, consult the Treatises on Partnership, under the following heads:—"Execution against a single Partner;"—"Bankruptcy of a single Partner."

na / of its own providing could quail its intestine dissensions.—If the difficulties just mentioned are not to be surmounted, its members would be excluded from justice, though obnoxious to the evils of litigation. Assuming that these difficulties are to be surmounted, its members could sue and be sued with effect; but their property might be wasted, and their enterprise defeated, by the bungling interference of the courts.

If a provision to the following effect were inserted in the deed of association, and were binding upon all the members, most of their disputes might be determined by a tribunal of their own. It might be provided, That every difference amongst all or any of the members, arising out of partnership matters, should be submitted to arbitration: That the parties to the dispute should appoint the arbitrators in a manner prescribed by the deed: That all the parties should be bound by their award: And that if arbitrators should not be appointed, or should not make an award, the majority of the company, or a committee elected by the majority, should take cognizance of the matter in difference, and make an award in their stead. If courts of justice would give effect to it, the agreement might be enforced in the following manner. In case a partner or partners sued upon any matter in difference, any of the defendants might appear to the suit, and answer to it by insisting upon the provision. In case a partner or partners resisted the domestic tribunal, any co-partner might sue upon its award, and the court might lend its process for the purpose of enforcing obedience. In either case, the only question which would probably arise in the suit, is this:—Whether the difference between the parties fell within the scope of the provision? or, in other words, whether the difference related to a partnership matter? This being decided in the affirmative, the complaint would be dismissed, in the one case; and the award would be enforced, in the other. The company would not be vexed with protracted litigation; nor would the awkward hands of the court be laid upon its property and trade*.

In attempting to recover its debts, a joint stock company, constituted in the ordinary manner, is stopped or impeded by those difficulties about parties to suits, to which we have already adverted. If a company were constituted en commandite, its claims upon strangers would be prosecuted with ease and effect. The partners en commandite being prohibited from dealing on its behalf, its contract would be made and its suits would be instituted, in the name or names of the acting partner or partners. In all its relations to strangers, the body, though large, would not be unwieldy, but could move as easily and promptly as a partnership consisting of a few.

But as to the wrongs which they are liable to suffer from one another, the members of a joint stock company, however it might be constituted, would be placed in an awkward position. A tribunal of their own might be handy and effective; but some would probably sustain, and all would fear, injustice from its occasional precipitance or partiality. A regular tribunal would be impotent; or if it interposed with effect, its interference would probably be mischievous. It could hardly cure a grievance, though peculiar to one or a few, without defeating the purpose for which the company was formed, and inflicting evil upon all. In their attempt to do justice between members of extensive partnerships, the regular courts (to borrow an illustration from Hobbes) "are a bungling sort of tinkers, who, with their clumsy endeavours to stop and solder, make more holes than they mend." In short, the members of the company would be debarred from redress; or every means of redress to which they appeal, however, lying to a regular tribunal, unless the right to appeal has been relinquished by agreement between themselves. These dispositions extend, not only to partners, but to those who are interested through them (aux veuves, héritiers, ou ayens-cause des associés). Whether separate creditors would be considered, for this purpose, as falling within the last description, we are not prepared to determine.

These dispositions, it appears to us, are of little or no use. Unless the right to appeal has been abandoned by agreement, the party dissatisfied with the award appeals, as of course; and the trouble of a fruitless reference is added to the vexations of a suit. The law would be more simple, and just as efficacious, if partners were permitted to choose their tribunal, but were bound by an agreement to refer.

* By certain dispositions of the French Commercial Code (Tit. 5, sec. 2.), partners are obliged to submit their differences to arbitration: an could resort, would be pregnant with inconvenience. To this disadvantage, as well as to the disadvantages of agency management, joint adventurers in extensive enterprises are inevitably exposed.—With which unfavourable conclusion, we now proceed, without further digression, to the direct and more appropriate purpose of the present section.

3. Every ignorant ruler is mightily given to rule. Not satisfied with protecting the governed from the harm which they might do to one another, the impertinent meddler must needs protect them from the harm which they might do to themselves. But in spite of all that may be thought by drivelling and presumptuous legislators, the great majority of mankind are prudent, as well as laborious. The cheering truth is established by the progress of all large communities from poverty to comparative opulence. Since capital could never accumulate in quantities worthy of the name, if most of those who are able to save were not habitually saving, and their savings were not applied to the business of production with habitual skill and discretion.

This consideration is decisive of the question which we are about. For though the proposed alteration would facilitate the establishment of joint stock companies, the members, or the great and passive majority, of every such company, would still be subject to peculiar and obvious disadvantages. But most men are habitually prudent; and (speaking generally and with a view to lasting results), persons who thought of adventuring in extensive joint enterprises, would not overlook these disadvantages. On the contrary, disadvantages so great and obvious would incite them to examine such projects with unusual attention and severity. Therefore (still speaking generally and with a view to lasting results), extensive joint enterprises would not be undertaken imprudently, although it were competent to the adventurers to limit their liability at pleasure.

That the inducements to examine such projects would be great and obvious, will hardly be disputed. It may, however, be objected, that most who thought of adventuring would be incompetent to the inquiry. To this objection, therefore, we will now address ourselves as briefly as the subject will permit.

A projected company might thrive in any of the following cases:—If the trade required such capitals as few individuals could command:—If solitary traders were commonly deterred from it by a prospect of unusual hazard:—If the cost of the commodity, as produced by an extensive capital, were less than the cost of it, as produced by a moderate or a small one*. Otherwise, individual traders, with small or moderate capitals, would occupy the trade: The profits of the company would be below the average rate; or it would trade at an absolute loss, and its capital would be wasted by the competition†.—In the first instance, therefore, it would be incumbent on the inquirer to determine, Whether the trade or enterprise fell within the classes which are enumerated at the outset of this essay‡.—If the commodity were already produced, either by established companies, or by individuals with extensive capitals; if their profits did not exceed the average rate of profit; and if they already produced the commodity at the smallest possible cost; the projected enterprise would not prosper, although it belonged to the classes to which we have just adverted. For the intended addition to the commodity would lower its actual price, and that price would be the lowest for which it could be produced with advantage. The next questions, therefore, which the inquirer might be called upon to resolve, are these:—Whether extensive capitals were already engaged in the trade? Whether the profits on those capitals were above the average rate? And whether the commodity, as produced by those capitals, were already produced at the smallest possible cost? Each of these questions contains more specific questions, which it would also be necessary to resolve. If he sought, for instance, to determine, whether the commodity were already produced at the smallest possible cost, it would be incumbent upon him to enter into these, amongst other, inquiries:—Whether the capitals already applied to its production were applied, under the most skilful, the most vigilant, and the most frugal management? If applied to mining, or to obtaining raw produce of any sort whatever, whether they were applied to the most fertile subjects? If applied to raising raw produce, or to any other purpose, whether the best instruments of production, or the best division of labour, had yet been introduced into the trade? Whether the projected company, in all or any of these respects, could produce the commodity with comparative advantage?

The preliminary question would present itself on a moment's reflexion; and, with regard to any common trade, would as speedily be resolved. Companies for supplying milk, or vegetables, or corn, or flour, or bread, or meat; for buying up and retailing fish; for burning bricks or lime; or for lending at interest on small pledges, are grossly absurd. It is manifest that individuals, with small or moderate capitals, can provide the commodities or services at a smaller cost. And looking at the common course of human affairs, we may be satisfied that the projectors of such companies would be listened to with indifference or derision.—If this preliminary question were determined against the project, the inquiry would go no further, and the inquirer would abstain from the adventure. If it were determined in favour of the project, he would proceed to the subsequent questions. He could probably be unable to decide these questions, and might be unable to decide the previous one, of his own knowledge. But he might always resort to evidence, sufficient for the guidance of his conduct, and such as any man of plain good sense could estimate. By whom has the company been projected? Who are its most active members? To whose management is the enterprise to be intrusted? What is the established reputation of these several persons for capacity, prudence, knowledge of the trade? What is their opinion of the project, as their opinion may be inferred, not from their representations, but from their actions? How far is their own property to be staked upon the result? Are the managers to be liable for the debts and engagements of the company, exclusively and without limitation? These are questions which he might determine with accuracy; and, by the result of the inquiry, he might safely regulate his conduct.

4. The result of the foregoing argument may be thus expressed:—A projected company would not prosper, unless it could produce the commodity at a smaller cost than its competitors, or the profits of those competitors were above the average rate. In either of these cases, the price of the commodity would be permanently lower, if the project were carried into execution. But these are the only cases in which companies would be established, although it were competent to partners to limit their liability at pleasure. Consequently, the rule of the English law is needless and pernicious. It is needless as a check upon improvident enterprise; whilst it tends to prevent undertakings which would benefit the adventurers, and the community.

V. But the rule (it may be said) will always be relaxed in favour of useful projects. If the parties to a joint enterprise desire to limit their liability, they may apply to the Crown. The servants of the Crown would inquire into its merits; and, in case they deemed it advantageous, a charter with the requisite immunities would be granted to the applicants as of course.

The answer is obvious and easy. The servants of the Crown would not investigate, although they were competent to the investigation. They would grant or refuse the immunity to save themselves the labour of inquiry, or to please influential persons, whom it was their interest to conciliate. Their decision, in short, would turn upon any thing, rather than the merits of the project. But assuming that they were willing to investigate, they would not be competent to the investigation. We have already suggested a few of the questions which it would be necessary to resolve; and have shewn that the interested parties would not be unequal to the task. Though most of them must rely upon testimony, they might thoroughly ascertain the competency and the designs of the witnesses*. The officers of the Crown would decide in the dark, whether they relied on their own fancied knowledge, or trusted to the opinions of others. If their ignorance and presumption were extraordinary, they would think themselves competent to the question, and would probably decide wrong. If they were better instructed, they would be guided by testimony, but by testimony which they could not estimate. They could not ascertain the competency and the designs of their informants, without more labour than they could afford to bestow upon the inquiry. If they listened to opinions unfavourable to the project, they might refuse the immunity, and defeat an useful enterprise, at the suggestion of the ignorant or the interested. If they acted on information obtained from the applicants, they would probably decide right, but their sanction would be superfluous and impertinent.—The evil of the general law is poorly palliated by the dispensing power of the Crown. The requisite immunities may often be withheld; and useful undertakings, prevented. And though the immunity be granted, the applicants are harassed with needless vexation, and loaded with unnecessary expense.

In short, the case stands thus:—Certain parties would undertake a certain enterprise, if they could limit their liability to creditors: the enterprise would be useful to the public, in case it were advantageous to themselves: the best evidence is within their reach, and they are prompted by their interest in the result to examine that evidence well. By whom, then, shall the matter be decided? Shall the interested parties be left to their own discretion? or shall the fate of the project be determined by public officers; who have not access to the best evidence; who lie under no inducement to examine the merits with care; who are probably indifferent to the question, or whose interest may be adverse to the community?

If the dispensing power of the Crown be a poor corrective of the evil, the occasional interference of the legislature is a worse. An application for an act of parliament conferring the requisite immunities, subjects the applicants to great expense, and to still greater vexation. The honourable and right honourable persons to whom the application is made, are utterly incompetent to determine the merits of the project. All are inevitably ignorant; most are indifferent and careless; and the few who bestir themselves, are partial. The negligence, the impudent injustice, with which pretended inquiries have been managed by honourable committees, have extorted expressions of indignation and scorn from the most temperate and discreet.

If an enterprise could not be accomplished without disturbing the rights of strangers, the legislature, though incompetent, must judge of the merits as it can. But no man would be molested in his rights by the enterprises which we now contemplate. If the parties to such a project could limit their liability at pleasure, could sue and be sued with effect, and could provide effectual means of stopping their internal dissensions, they would neither require nor demand immunities from Parliament or the Crown. By a skilful amendment of the general law, all such cases would be provided for at once. To that extent, Parliament and the officers of the Crown would be relieved from inquiries to which they are utterly incompetent, and their attention would be less diverted from those objects of general interest which are the business of legislators and rulers.

The tendency, therefore, of the existing law, is to prevent advantageous undertakings; the exemptions occasionally granted correct the evil imperfectly; nor is the evil compensated by any assignable good. The disadvantages of trading in companies are so great and obvious, that the rule is unnecessary as a check upon improvident enterprise. That it is needless as a security to strangers, dealing with such companies, we shall endeavour to establish in the following section.

VI. 1. By a simple and obvious scheme of registration, creditors of companies constituted en commandite would be less, or not more, obnoxious to loss and disappointment than creditors of companies constituted in the ordinary manner.

It might be enacted, That the establishment of every such partnership should be notified to the public by registration: That every original member should enter in the register—his name and description, his share or interest in the joint-stock and profits, and the extent of his intended liability: That the date of the entry should also be expressed: That if he were a partner en commandite, he should be held responsible in solido, for all engagements contracted by the company previously to the date of the entry: That every person afterwards becoming a member should also make a like entry, and should be liable, in like manner, till such entry should be made: That every outgoing partner should notify the fact by registration, and, as between himself and strangers to the company, should continue a partner till the fact should be so advertised.

If a company were thus registered, its creditors would be little exposed to loss and disappointment, though most of its members were liable to a limited extent. They would certainly be less exposed to loss and disappointment, than if all its members were liable without limitation, but the company were unregistered. For, first, if the company were constituted en commandite, but were registered in the manner proposed, all or most of its members would be disclosed by the register, and their obligations, though limited, could be enforced. If all were responsible in solido, but the company were unregistered, most or many of its members might escape the search of its creditors, and their obligations, though unlimited in law, might yet be illusory in practice. Secondly, If the company were constituted en commandite, but were registered in the manner proposed, a person who thought of giving credit to the company, might learn the names and stations of its members. He could inquire into their means of answering their obligations, and could guess at the extent of the fund upon which he must rely for satisfaction. If all the members were responsible in solido, but the company were unregistered, most or many of its members might be unknown, and the extent of the fund upon which he must rely for satisfaction could not be conjectured. Their liability would be unbounded, but their means of answering their obligations might be placed beyond inquiry.

It may be thought that these advantages would be owing to registration, and not to the distinctive properties of partnerships en commandite;—that if a company were constituted in the ordinary manner, but each of its members were obliged to register his name, these advantages would be superadded to the advantages of unlimited liability. It must, however, be remembered, that a partner en commandite would lie under a strong inducement to observe the proposed enactment. For in case he neglected to observe it, he would be liable without limitation. But if a partner were responsible in solido, whether he registered or not, he would lie under no inducement to comply with the obligation to register, and would lie under some inducement to withhold his compliance. For in case his name were entered, he would be obvious to creditors of the company; whilst in case it were not inserted, he might chance to escape their demands. It is true that the obligation to register might be sanctioned by penalties; but it is also true that the penalties would be unpopular, and would rarely be inflicted. With regard, therefore, to companies constituted in the ordinary manner, a law directing registration would often be evaded. With regard to companies constituted en commandite, it would generally be observed. To borrow a concise, though not very accurate, expression, the law, as it related to the latter, would execute itself. As it related to the former, the law could only be enforced by the imperfect instrumentality of punishment.

It, therefore, appears to us, that creditors of a company constituted en commandite would be less obnoxious to loss and disappointment, than creditors of a company constituted in the ordinary manner.—They would not be more obnoxious, though the members of either company could be known with equal certainty. A person who thought of giving credit to a partnership en commandite, would know that most of its members were liable to a limited extent. He would, therefore, trust with greater caution than if their liability were unbounded. The limited liability of its members might limit its power of obtaining credit, but would not be injurious to its creditors.

2. In their attempts to recover their debts, claimants upon companies, constituted in the ordinary manner, are embarrassed with some of those difficulties, touching the parties to suits, which we mentioned in a foregoing section. If a company were constituted en commandite, no such difficulties would lie in the way of its creditors. Excepting the case of bankruptcy, the acting partner or partners would be liable, exclusively, for the debts and engagements of the body. Suits by creditors of the company would be prosecuted against one or a few, though the fund to which they might resort would be formed by the contributions of many.—In case the acting partners became bankrupt, difficulties might arise from the magnitude of the business, and from the number of debts due and owing by and to the company; but no peculiar difficulties would be presented by its peculiar constitution. The assignees in bankruptcy, or other representatives of the creditors, could recover as easily from a partner en commandite as from any other debtor to the joint estate. If any such partner, by any act or default, had made himself liable without limitation for all or any of the partnership engagements, his estate might be administered in bankruptcy with those of the managing partners.

Acts of Parliament are sometimes passed, empowering companies to sue, and making them liable to be sued, by a clerk or other officer. And creditors of a company, constituted in the ordinary manner, but liable to be thus sued, would not be embarrassed with the difficulties to which we have just adverted. But its liability to be thus sued is imposed by a special enactment. Without such special enactment, these difficulties would arise; and they, therefore, constitute one of the many reasons for a change in the law of partnership.

3. We have heard it suggested, and, at first, we inclined to believe, that the abolition of the usury laws would be equivalent, or nearly equivalent, to the proposed alteration in the law of partnership.

In many respects, the lender at interest unlimited by law, and the contributor of capital ex commandite, would be placed in the same, or similar positions. Substantially, though not in name, the capital of the latter, as well as the capital of the former, would be advanced by way of loan. Each would be free from the labour of employing his capital productively, and would, therefore, get interest merely, instead of obtaining profit: the only difference being, that the first would contract with the borrower, or borrowers, for interest, ex nemine, and at so much per centum, upon the capital to be advanced; whilst the last would contract with the acting partner, or partners, for some larger or smaller share in the varying profits of the enterprise. In either case, the rate of the remuneration would be fixed by the contracting parties, and would, accordingly, be higher or lower, as the risk to be run by the lender or contributor appeared to be greater or less. The risk, too, of each would be limited. The capital advanced, with an arrear of interest, is all that the lender would hazard; whilst the possible loss of the partner ex commandite would be commensurate with the amount of his contribution.

Thus far, a loan at interest, and a loan ex commandite, would be tantamount. In one important particular, they would differ. In the event of the borrower's insolvency, the lender at interest might resort to the insolvent estate, in competition with his other creditors, or, perhaps, to their exclusion. In the event of his partner's insolvency, the partner ex commandite would not be admitted to the joint or separate estate, till every creditor of every other class had been satisfied in full*. The other creditors of the borrower, as well as the other creditors of the acting partner, might have trusted to the whole of the ostensible means which had been at their debtor's disposition; but the lender would exhaust, or subtract from, the fund upon which they had relied for satisfaction, whilst the capital contributed by the commanditaire would be applied, exclusively, in payment or liquidation of their demands.

But as the other creditors of the borrower ex commandite would be more secure than those of the borrower at interest, so would the former command more extensive credit, in making purchases, and in other dealings with third persons. If the borrower at interest traded with a large capital, it would probably be known, or surmised, that the capital or the bulk of it had been so borrowed, and that the owner or owners, in the event of his insolvency, could resort to the estate in competition with his other creditors. (The borrower ex commandite would inspire as much confidence as if he traded, or were thought to trade, with capital of his own.) The apparent capital with which he traded could be compared with the contributions which were entered in the register; and if the extent of that capital tallied pretty closely with the amount of those contributions, it would be likely that the bulk of it had been advanced by the commanditaires, and, by consequence, was not liable to the claims of secret owners.

The abolition, therefore, of the laws against usury would not be exactly equivalent to the change in the law of partnership.

In consequence of either improvement, enterprises requiring extensive capitals, or attended with unusual hazard, would be easier of execution than at present; for by either improvement, the inducements to advance capital in aid of such enterprises would be multiplied. In either event, persons advancing funds to the managers of such enterprises would be empowered, at once, to limit their possible losses, and to reserve such interest on the capitals, lent or contributed, as would compensate the risk of the investment.

So far, however, as the success of the enterprise might depend upon the credit of the manager, an enterprise to be carried on with borrowed capital would be more facilitated by the change in the law of partnership, than by the abolition of the laws against usury. To the manager himself, loans of capital en commandite would clearly be more advantageous than loans of capital at interest. Looking at the event of his insolvency, the risk of lending en commandite would exceed the risk of lending at interest; since, in that event, a lender at interest would recover a part of his loan, whilst a lender en commandite might lose the whole of his contribution. But the greater risk on that side would probably be counterbalanced by greater security on another. For the success of the enterprise being more probable, the insolvency of the borrower would be less likely. If the hazard, on the whole, were somewhat greater, this additional hazard would, of course, be considered in adjusting the terms of the contract.

As the evil of the law of partnership would not be completely cured by the abolition of the usury laws, so would the evil of those barbarous laws be mitigated, but not removed, by the change which we have ventured to suggest. In many cases, interest could not be taken, or could not be taken conveniently, in the form of profit. In others, a command of credit would be of little or no advantage to the borrower. In all, a loan at interest, as involving no intricate account, would be more simple, and less troublesome to the parties, than a partnership en commandite.

In short, the laws against usury, and the rule of the law of partnership, are needless and mischievous restraints upon the discretion of lenders and borrowers. The removal of either restriction would mitigate the evil of the other; but in order to obtain the full complement of good, both of them must be abolished.

VII. 1. It may be objected, that if partners could limit their liability at their own discretion, the inclination to adventure in joint enterprises would be strengthened. Consequently, the number of extensive partnerships would increase. Trades of almost every sort would be attempted by joint stock companies; and traders, carrying on such trades individually, or in small partnerships, would be undersold, and driven from the market, by these powerful competitors. But this process would be attended by great immediate evil to numerous individuals, and would be followed by great permanent evil to the community at large. The capitals of the traders, who were thus supplanted, would be destroyed, or diminished by the contest; and the capital of the community, which is the fund for the maintenance of the labourer, would, consequently, be diminished in the same proportion.

Futile as this objection is, it would certainly be opposed by very grave and authoritative men to the proposed alteration of the law. In the course of the discussions, public and private, oral and in print, which arose out of the recent multiplication of joint stock companies, it was assumed by many, that the evils here supposed were not sufficiently guarded against by the existing law of partnership. It was repeatedly predicted, from high places as well as from low places, in parliament, and from the bench, as well as in pamphlets and newspapers, that if some check, more effectual than the bubble act, were not put by the legislature upon the increase of joint stock companies, they would surely intrude themselves into every trade, underselling their solitary competitors, and driving them from the market with the loss of the whole, or the greater portion of their capitals. By the more eloquent and absurd of these talkers and writers, hard names of all sorts were lavished upon such companies. They were denounced as "combinations," "confederacies," "conspiracies," formed by numerous and powerful bodies of men against the fair and honest industry of individual dealers. A joint stock company, opposed to a solitary trader, was rhetorically compared to a giant overwhelming a dwarf: and the legislature was implored to rescue "individual industry," from such unequal and ruinous competition.—For these reasons, we have stated the objection distinctly, and shall give it a distinct answer, although the answer is implied in an earlier part of our essay.

At the long run, the price of a commodity is just sufficient to repay the cost of producing it, and to yield a profit, at the mean or average rate, on the capital expended in its production. No often as its price is more than sufficient to satisfy these two conditions, the profits on the capitals engaged in its production are above the average rate. Capital, therefore, is turned to the trade from less profitable employments; more of the commodity is brought into the market; and its price is brought down to the lowest point at which it can permanently be produced. So often as its price is not sufficient to satisfy these two conditions, the actual traders are trading at a loss, or the profits on their capitals are below the average rate. Capital, therefore, is turned from the trade, or is applied to it in diminished quantities; less of the commodity is brought into the market; and its price is raised to the point at which it is practicable to produce it. With the causes which determine the average rate of profit, we have no concern. It is enough for our present purpose, that the price of a commodity, at the long run, is just sufficient to cover the cost of producing it, and to yield a profit, at this average rate, on the capital expended in its production*.

When a joint stock company is projected, the profits of the individual traders, engaged in the trade in which it is proposed to adventure, are above, or on a level with, or below this average rate. If their profits be on a level with, or below the average rate, the projected company could not undersell them, making a profit on its capital at that average rate, unless it could produce the commodity at a smaller cost. This is so clear that it hardly admits of proof.

Now the projected company is to embark its capital in raising raw produce, or in some manufacture, or in mere buying and selling. On any of these suppositions, it may happen, that the most efficient instruments of production, or the most economical division of labour, which it is possible to introduce into the trade, are beyond the reach of a small, or of a moderate, capital. If this be the case, the projected company, which would command a large capital, could introduce either or both of these improvements, and might produce the commodity at a diminished cost. If the best instruments of production, and the best division of labour, which the trade will admit of, be within the reach of a small, or of a moderate, capital, they have been, or would be, introduced by individual traders; and these individual traders could produce the commodity at a smaller cost than the company. For the company, by the supposition, would derive no peculiar advantages from its large capital, whilst it would produce the commodity under the peculiar disadvantages of trading with that large capital in an extensive partnership.

It has hitherto been supposed that the projected Company could not diminish the cost of producing the commodity, unless it could introduce more efficient instruments of production, or a more economical division of labour. And very generally speaking, this is true: though cases may be imagined, in which its larger capital might enable it to reduce the cost, without the introduction of either of these improvements. This would be less unlikely to happen, if its capital were embarked in raising raw produce. By an outlay of capital, such as no individual could support, it might open sources of raw produce (as, for instance, veins of lead, copper, or other metal) more fertile, but less accessible, than any that were actually resorted to: and this, without improving upon the usual instruments of production, or upon the established distribution of employments. In the actual state of knowledge, it might be impossible to improve the ordinary methods of production; and yet new and more fertile sources of raw produce might be laid open by those methods, if they were applied with a degree of persistence which none but a large capital could sustain. To the present purpose, however, the manner in which the projected company might diminish the cost of production, is of no importance. In every imaginable case, though the cost might be diminished, on the one hand, by certain peculiar advantages which the company might derive from its large capital, it would certainly be enhanced, on the other, by the peculiar disadvantages to which the company would be subject in trading with that large capital in an extensive partnership.

* This must, of course, be taken with limitations. It will not apply to a commodity which is sold under a monopoly. It will not apply to a commodity which can only be produced in definite quantities. If part of a commodity yield rent, it will only apply to that part of it which is produced at the greatest cost. For the present purpose, however, rent may be considered, without inconvenience, as entering into the cost of production.

From what has been premised, these consequences immediately follow. When the company is projected, the actual profits of the individual traders may be on a level with, or below, the average rate. In order to undersell them, making a profit on its capital at that average rate, the company, on either supposition, must diminish the actual cost of producing the commodity. On the first supposition, it must diminish this cost to such an extent, as to compensate for the intended reduction of the actual price: on the second, to such an extent, as not only to compensate for this intended reduction of price, but also to cover the difference between the average rate of profit, and the actual profits of the individual traders who are already engaged in the trade. If the profits of the individual traders, when the company is projected, be above the average rate, the efficient demand for the commodity is not adequately met by the actual supply; and these individual traders enjoy, for the time, what may be called, by analogy, a monopoly: In which case, additional capital would be turned to the production of the commodity, till its price were brought down to the lowest point at which it could permanently be produced. But, in producing the commodity, the company would derive peculiar advantages from its large capital, or it would not. If it would not, additional capital would be turned to the production of the commodity, by some of the individuals already engaged in producing it, or by other individuals, whom the extraordinary profits of the trade would tempt to compete with the former. For in the case supposed, individual traders could undersell the company, and would have nothing to apprehend from its competition. At the outset, therefore, and for a very short time after, it might possibly undersell its individual competitors, and make a profit on its capital at the average rate, but it would speedily be reduced to compete, in a market adequately supplied, with rivals who could produce the commodity at a smaller cost than itself.

The result of the analysis is, that the projected company could not undersell the solitary trader, making a profit on its capital at the average rate, unless it could produce the commodity at a smaller cost. Consequently, it is only in those cases, in which the cost of a commodity, as produced by a large capital, would be less than the cost of it, as produced by a small one, that joint stock companies will probably be set on foot in opposition to individual traders. But in all those cases, the establishment of such companies is not less advantageous to the community at large than to the members of these smaller societies. In consequence of their establishment, the commodities, which they undertake to provide, are produced in the previous quantities with less labour and capital; or, with the previous quantities of labour and capital, more of these commodities is produced. In either event, the labour and capital of the community are more productive; or, to vary the expression, the sum of its commodities is increased.

But if its labour and capital become more productive, its capital will accumulate more rapidly: for all capital is saved from the product of labour, originally, and from the joint product of labour and capital, permanently; and the larger the product from which savings are made, the larger will the savings be. Consequently, the general and ultimate effect of the establishment of joint stock companies, is, not to diminish, but to enlarge, the capital of the community.

It may still be urged, that the capital of the individual trader, whom a joint stock company supplants, is diminished or destroyed by the competition, though the establishment of the company be advantageous to the community at-large. But a total or partial destruction of the capitals engaged in producing it, is a necessary consequence of every contrivance for lessening the cost of a commodity, whether it be introduced by individuals or by companies. By the introduction, for instance, of more efficient machinery, the old impotent machinery is rendered useless, and its owners must adopt the improvement, or withdraw from the trade. If the loss which individual traders would thus sustain be a good objection to the establishment of joint stock companies, it is also a good objection to every improvement in agriculture, manufactures, or commerce; to every advance which has been, or can be, made, in the progress from rudeness to refinement.

2. It has been further objected to joint stock companies, that they enhance the price of commodities; or, in the vulgar language of the objectors, that such companies are monopolies. The answer to this objection is implied in our answer to the preceding one. For, if individual industry will not probably be disturbed by the intrusion of joint stock companies, unless they can produce at a smaller cost, it follows that the effect of their establishment is to diminish the price of commodities. But since the objection has been confidently urged by men of pretension and weight, we think it not unworthy of a more particular refutation.

A monopoly, properly so called, is an exclusive right of selling; and since its usual effect is to raise the price of the commodity above the lowest price at which it might be produced, a trader who sells his commodity for more than that lowest price, is said, by analogy, to enjoy a monopoly, though subject to unlimited competition. But a joint stock company, of the nature contemplated by the objectors, is subject to unlimited competition, and, therefore, has no monopoly, properly so called. That it could never acquire and maintain a monopoly, in the improper acceptation of the term, may be made manifest without many words.

In producing the commodity, it derives peculiar advantages from its large capital, or it does not. On the first supposition, it can undersell its individual competitors. On the second supposition, it cannot make a profit at the average rate, unless it can raise the price to such a degree as to compensate for the peculiar disadvantages of trading in an extensive partnership. But this is impossible; since the consumers can resort to individual traders, who produce the commodity at a smaller cost than the company. The company, therefore, obtains the command of the market, by lessening the cost and lowering the price of the commodity, or it is driven from the market by the smaller cost and lower price at which the commodity is produced and sold by its competitors. In either event, the commodity is sold for the lowest price at which it is practicable to produce it. More briefly, there is no monopoly.

It has, however, been supposed, that a company might persist in trading at a loss, till the capitals of its competitors were exhausted; and having thus obtained the exclusive command of the market, might take ample compensation for the capital which it had sunk, by raising the price of the commodity at its own discretion. In the language imputed to Lord

Eldon, "the company might undersell till all competitors were driven out of the market, and then do as it pleased."

Assuming that a company could thus obtain the exclusive command of the market, it could only obtain it by sinking a portion of its capital. Therefore it might be questioned by each of the projecting adventurers, whether he could not make more, by a profit at the average rate on his entire capital, than by any amount of extraordinary profits which he could thus derive from the remnant. If he could, there would be no inducement to adventure in the joint enterprise, and the company would not be established. But a company could not obtain the exclusive command of the market in the manner imagined. For so soon as it raised the price above the lowest point at which the commodity might be produced, it would be encountered by fresh competitors, whom it must also undersell, and drive from the market; and so on, without end. Consequently, a joint stock company will never acquire and maintain the exclusive command of the market, unless it produce at a smaller cost, and sell at a lower price, than any who are at liberty to compete with it. To adopt a just, though epigrammatic, remark of Lord Liverpool, a company may establish a monopoly, but it will be a monopoly in favour of the public.

VIII. The arguments which we have urged against the rule of the Law of Partnership may be applied, with some variations, to the provisions of the Bubble Act. Speaking generally, and with a view to lasting results, joint stock companies will not be projected or established, unless the joint undertakings be advantageous to the adventurers and the public. Fictitious obstacles to the formation of such companies are, therefore, needless and pernicious.—To insist at length upon the inexpediency of these provisions were useless as well as tedious. The act is now repealed; and it will hardly be replaced by an act of a similar tendency.

Lord Eldon, indeed, is said to have declared that the acts prohibited by the statute are offences at common law. We incline, however, to hope that his lordship has been misrepresented.

That the statute was unintelligible—that the ends at which it aimed were unknown and unknowable—that it no where defined the acts which it denounced a offences—has been stated distinctly by the present Attorney-General, and may be gathered from the various cases in which it has been attempted to enforce it. Whether the assuming to act as a corporate body was in itself an offence? or whether such assumption were not an offence, unless the project were pernicious? what it was that amounted to such assumption? and how a pernicious was to be distinguished from an innocent project? are only a few of the doubts which have been suggested by this statute, and which the courts of justice have found it impossible to resolve.

If the acts prohibited by the statute be offences at common law, the people of this country are obnoxious to penalties, and are left in ignorance of the conduct by which the penalties may be incurred.

IX. If the change which we have suggested were made in the law of partnership, applications for charters or acts of parliament would be less frequent than at present. By the general law, as thus modified, the members of a joint stock company could limit their liability to creditors; whilst the body could sue and be sued effectually and with ease: And these, or some of them, are the very purposes for which such applications are frequently made by parties to joint undertakings.

But though these purposes were fully provided for by a change in the general law, applications for acts of parliament would often be necessary. If the purpose contemplated by the parties be inconsistent with the rights of others, the purpose, it is obvious, cannot be accomplished, unless the obstacle be removed by the special interposition of the legislature.

In every case of the kind, the legislature, though poorly qualified for the task, inquires, or ought to inquire, into the merits of the projected enterprise. For in order to determine the expediency of granting or refusing the application, it must compare the good which the project might produce, with the evil of infringing upon the rights which lie in the way of its execution.

To suggest improvements upon the imperfect method in which such inquiries are now conducted, and to ascertain the principles by which they ought to be guided, was amongst the purposes which we contemplated when we entered upon the present article. The matter, however, is so extensive that we must postpone the consideration of it to some future opportunity. Strictly speaking, too, it forms no part of our proper subject. Individual as well as joint enterprises may need the aid of the legislature, though its assistance is more frequently applied for by parties to joint undertakings.

Law of Merchant and Factor.

FIFTY years hence, it will perhaps be scarcely credited, that up to the year 1825, an English factor to whom the law allowed the power of selling, unqualifiedly, goods consigned to him by his principal, was prohibited by that same law from exercising the qualified power of pledging the goods upon the faith of the bill of lading. If having sold them, he ran away with his principal's money, the principal had no claim against the vendor; but if he ran away, having pledged them on the faith of the bill of lading, even without notice of the existence of a principal, the principal might recover his goods from the pledgee, without paying the money which had been advanced.

Notwithstanding this rule has been acted on ever since the case of Pateron v. Tash, (2 Strange 1178. 16th Geo. II.) the merchants seem to have thought it impossible that such a rule should have been laid down, or at all events, that it should have been persisted in: they knew that the rules of common law are established by decided cases; they knew that decided cases are often overruled; and they must have expected that sooner or later the decision in Pateron v. Tash would have been abandoned: for during the last seventy years there has not been a more fruitful source of obstinate and expensive litigation than the transactions of factors who have pledged goods upon the faith of the bill of lading. The courts, however, adhered to their rule, although Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Le Blanc disapproved of it. Chief Justice Best, in an able judgment, evincing clear and comprehensive views of the subject, said, “Had I authority to alter the law, as the mode of carrying on commerce has altered, I would say that, when the owner of property conceals himself, whoever can prove a good title under the person whom the concealed owner permits to hold it, should retain that property against the owner;—but this is not yet the law of England. Possession is not proof of property. Our ancestors kept their goods in their own possession. If agents were employed by them to deal with their property, they did not keep themselves out of view, and the extent of the authority of the agent was so well known, that no one dealing with those agents could be imposed upon. But as little credit was given, and as men could not trade beyond their capital, they were seldom reduced to the necessity of pledging their stock in trade. The sales of merchandise were made in market overt, and if the buyers conducted themselves honestly, the law protected them from suffering by purchasing in market overt property that did not belong to the person of whom they bought. This exception in our law proves that if a person acquires the possession of property in any mode, other than that of sale in market overt, he cannot keep it against the owner; it proves at the same time, that, as commerce is now carried on, the purchaser or pawnee should have the same protection, against him who permits another to deal with his property as if it were his own. But a small proportion of the merchandise that is now brought to sale, is sold in market overt. The law relative to sales in market overt, affords, therefore, but little protection to those who are engaged in commerce.

The owners of goods for many reasons keep themselves concealed, and put forward brokers to act for unknown principals. If such brokers abuse their trust, those who have trusted them should suffer*.”

But as the law stood, if the pawner of goods had no authority to pledge them on the faith of the bill of lading, the pawnee could not hold them against the owner.

The practice of pledging on the faith of the bill of lading is a matter of convenience and often of necessity, whether the consignee be factor or absolute owner. Before the consignee can obtain his goods he has often heavy charges to pay for freight, wharfage, &c.;—at the time the goods arrive, the market may be low, and he cannot sell except at a loss; in three months it may rise; he may at the moment be destitute of other resources, and how is he to pay the charges and wait the turn in the market, except by pledging the bill of lading? But the money lender, as the law stood, would not be justified in making an advance till he had ascertained that the party offering the goods was not a factor: and whether he were factor or absolute owner, in general the proof of this, as we shall presently show, could not be furnished except to the destruction of the adventure. The inconvenience and injustice occasioned by the rule became at length so intolerable, that the merchants of London in a body petitioned the Legislature to declare, that any person intrusted with, and in possession of a bill of lading, should be taken to be the owner of the lading for all purposes of contract entered into on the faith of such bill, unless there was notice that he was not owner; and an act to effect this has now been passed†—passed, with the concurrence and approbation of all parties, except Mr. Scarlett, and some other lawyers out of the house.—Mr. Scarlett spoke at great length against the bill, and afterwards published his speech. His objections appear to be, in substance, That to sanction the pledge made by the factor will enable him to defraud his principal to a greater extent and with greater facility than before, and that the loss will fall on the least culpable of the conflicting claimants; the foreign merchant having fewer means of knowing his factor's character than the English money lender has of ascertaining the title to the goods offered in pledge: And further, that the money lender is not compelled to lend his money, but the foreign merchant, in order to carry on his trade, is compelled to employ a factor.

Now, if a factor who is disposed to commit a fraud, has it always in his power to sell his principal's goods and run away with the money, we cannot see how the facility for fraud, or the extent of the fraud, can be materially increased by enabling him to pledge as well as sell. Wherever he can pledge, there also he can sell, and he can always obtain more money by selling than by pledging.—If he be not allowed to pledge, lest he pledge with a view to fraud, neither ought he to be allowed to sell; and the less so, because the latter is the larger power; when he pledges, there is always a locus poenitentiae, and he may redeem the goods; if he sell and apply the money to his own use, there is no chance left for the principal.

It is by no means clear that the English money-lender has better opportunities of knowing the factor's character than the foreign merchant. The foreign merchant does not employ the factor till he has made due inquiry as to his respectability; he makes this inquiry, and receives his intelligence from other merchants, who, like the money-lender, live in the same town with the factor. With respect to the greater facilities which the money-lender is alleged to possess of ascertaining the title to the goods offered in pledge, it is gravely urged by Mr. Scarlett, that the letters of advice respecting the cargo could be easily produced. Such a proposal is utterly inconsistent with the practice of trading. The letters of advice contain, in general at least, an account of the price given and the price expected, two facts which the seller would of course be anxious to conceal. They contain also, for the most part, notices of the state of the market in other places, the smallest hint of which is often of infinite value, if exclusively known, but that value diminishes in proportion as it is made public, because all who know it may become sharers of the advantages to be thence derived. But it is idle to dwell on the absurdity of proposing to merchants, to produce their correspondence to rivals in trade. If it be proposed to give extracts of letters, what lender would be satisfied with the fairness of the extract without seeing the original? And if it be proposed to accompany the bill of lading with a letter adapted for shew, that would be a circuitous proceeding for an end which, under the present act, may be much more simply attained.

It follows, of course, from the foregoing reasoning, that the same necessity for secrecy which precludes the factor from shewing his principal's letter of advice, will generally render it expedient for the principal to conceal his own name, and to let the factor appear to the world as owner. The very name of merchants of high reputation is enough to induce others to follow their course implicitly.

With regard to the argument that the money-lender is not under any necessity to lend his money, but that the foreign merchant is compelled, in order to carry on his trade, to employ a factor,—we trust we shall not be deemed presumptuous if we say that it does not deserve an answer. Why does the money-lender advance his money? to make a profit on it. Why does the foreign merchant consign his goods to the British factor? to make a profit on them. The money-lender might invest his money in other ways;—yes—but to less advantage, or he would not advance it to the consignee. The foreign merchant might sell his goods where they are produced;—yes—but to less advantage, or he would not consign them to the factor. There is evidently no more compulsion in the one transaction than in the other.

But, however the question may stand upon the points we have already discussed, a rule has been often laid down and approved of, that if one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud of a third, the loss shall fall upon him who enabled the third to commit the fraud. The law with regard to factors was an exception to this rule; for when a factor had, without authority, pledged the goods of his principal, and carried off the money, the loss fell upon the lender, who had taken the goods as his security; whereas the principal was the person who had, by trusting the goods without a qualified bill of lading, enabled the factor to hold himself out as owner, and so to commit the fraud, when he might have prevented all the mischief by adding two words to the bill of lading. Upon this principle it is that Chief Justice Best says, “where the owner of property conceals himself, whoever can prove a good title under the person whom the concealed owner permits to hold it, should retain that property against the owner.”

And upon this principle it is, according to Lord Liverpool, that the present act has passed the legislature.

But though the act gives validity to the pledging, it enables the principal to decide whether he intends his factor to have the power of pledging or not, and if not, to prevent it, by notice in the bill of lading, that his consignee is only factor.

And it is this circumstance which essentially distinguishes the case of a factor who pledges goods on the faith of a bill of lading from that of a tenant who pawns the furniture of a ready-furnished lodging, or the swindler who pawns the coach he has hired. The principal may always prevent the factor from pledging, by stating in the bill of lading that the goods are consigned to him as factor, and if he omit to do this, he in effect assists in enabling the factor to deceive the money-lender: the landlord or the letter of coaches have no such means of apprising the whole world, that the parties who have hired their goods are without authority to pledge, and it is not easy to mark either the furniture or the coach with the owner's name. Mr. Scarlett, however, by a train of reasoning which seems to imply but little acquaintance with the principles of jurisprudence, has contended that if the pledgee of goods who has advanced money to a factor, under the faith of a bill of lading, be entitled to hold those goods against the owner till his advance be repaid, so ought the pawnbroker who has advanced money upon a gentleman's plate pawned by his servant, or upon a landlord's furniture pawned by his tenant. His argument is, that it would be "a solecism in reasoning, "to infer a greater right and power in the "holder of the mere order or authority to "receive the possession, than in the actual "possessor. To say that the custody of "the various documents, which entitled the "holder of them to receive possession of "merchandise, should be conclusive evidence of his right to transfer the property, but that the actual possession of "the merchandise itself, which was the "result and consequence of these documents, and in effect the very consummation of their object, should confer no "such right, was a manifest absurdity. "It seemed, therefore, that the necessary "consequence of this law, was to revive "the only rule of property in the first "stages of society, namely, possession*."

Now, where there is any law of property, the events must be specified which are to invest a party with the rights of ownership. Savages may choose occupancy, but slight experience shews the inconvenience of fixing on that. The custom of merchants has, in case of a transfer of a cargo from a foreign to an English merchant, fixed on the bill of lading, whereby the foreign owner orders the goods to be delivered to the English merchant. The present act has in some degree given validity to this custom, and it is difficult to imagine any event more proper for the purpose; it is of a known formality, is executed under circumstances of deliberation, and is capable of easy and certain proof.

It has always been found in jurisprudence, that the possession of writings indicating a transfer of property, is the fittest event to invest a party with the right of ownership. Mr. Scarlett does not esteem it any solecism, that the party who possesses a parchment conveyance, by lease and release, of Abinger Farm, should exercise a greater dominion over that farm, than the tenant who is in actual occupation of it. Why then should not the possessor of a bill of lading exercise a greater dominion over the goods to which it refers, than the party who has the bare possession unaccompanied with any writing? or why should naked possession confer a power which convention and law have said shall only be conferred by the bill of lading? By convention and law the bill of lading now constitutes as clear a title to goods, that is, a right to exercise dominion over them, as a lease and release does to exercise dominion over land. Why is it more of a solecism in the one case than in the other, that the bare possessor cannot exercise such dominion? The servant who pawns his master's plate brings no attestation of title, and the pawnbroker who advances him money stands in the same condition as a mortgagee, who, without requiring abstracts of title, should incautiously advance money on land, upon a conveyance in fee by a mere tenant for years. It is impossible, therefore, without subverting all our notions of title, to affirm that the bare possessor of goods stands, or ought to stand, in the same situation with respect to dominion over them, as he who brings written evidence, indicating a transfer to himself. It is only where money is advanced upon the faith of a bill of lading, without notice of the existence of any owner but the person named in the bill, that the new act recognizes the validity of the pledge; and it does not follow that because the law recognizes a transfer of goods, made by a person who produces some written evidence of title, it should recognize a transfer made by a person who has no such evidence to produce.

Combination and Combination Laws.

It was our intention to have entered at large into this important topic; but we have been induced to suspend our undertaking for the present; partly by reason of the dissolution of the various combinations which have agitated the country during the last twelve months, and still more from the necessity we were under of trenching upon the space set apart for the consideration of this subject for the purpose of fully investigating the state of the law with respect to joint stock companies; a subject which is likely to excite considerable discussion in the ensuing session of Parliament. We must, therefore, confine ourselves to a mere outline of what we proposed to have written on the question of the Combination Laws.

The mischief of laws prohibiting combinations of workmen, is,—not that they can, to any material extent, produce an effect upon wages, but that they give rise to a false and dangerous opinion, both among masters and men, that they have such an operation.

The rate of wages must, in the long run, depend on the relation between the capital of a country and its population. The whole capital of the country, with the exception of what is locked up in tools, buildings, unwrought materials, and unsold goods, constitutes the fund for the maintenance of labour. The interest of the capitalists will always insure the distribution of this whole sum among the labourers: otherwise a portion of their capitals would be lying idle.

Now, it is clearly impossible that the labourers should ever get more than the whole; therefore, if a general combination could raise wages all over the country, the capitalist could not continue to employ the whole of the labourers; they would employ a part at increased wages, and the remainder must starve, or be maintained by their comrades.

Even by a sacrifice of their property, the capitalists could not maintain the same number of labourers as before, at higher wages. They do not receive their profits till they have sold their goods. They cannot sell them till they have made them; and it is for the very purpose of making them that they want labourers. They cannot hire labourers with that which they themselves do not receive, and till the production has been completed by the agency of those labourers.

In a particular trade, indeed, it may be in the power of the workmen, by preventing other workmen from entering the trade in more than a certain number, to keep their wages above the average rate; their masters being of course indemnified in the price of the goods, which price, if the goods be of necessary consumption, they may succeed in raising for a short time. But it is evident that any such advantage, to be gained by any particular class of workmen, must be gained at the expense of the rest. If they attract to themselves a larger portion of the capital of the country, there must remain a smaller portion for the workmen in other trades. This, however, is no evil; because the increase of population would soon have reduced wages in those other trades to their lowest level; so that these partial combinations, if they can be maintained without violence, have at least the effect of saving, for a time, a few persons from the otherwise universal depression.

As a general proposition, however, it seems to follow, from what has been said above, that unless the capital of a country increase faster than the population, wages cannot rise; and if the population increase faster than the capital, wages must fall. Suppose the capitalists of a given district to have been able, at the ordinary rate of profits, to employ, in 1800, one hundred workmen at 3s. a-day, or at any rate of wages yielding them something more than a bare subsistence:—Suppose the capital, in 1820, to have increased one-half:—if at that time the number of the workmen shall only have increased to 150, the demand for their services among the capitalists remaining the same in proportion, the rate of wages will remain the same: but suppose the number of workmen to have reached 200, the additional 50 must either starve, for want of employment, or obtain it by offering to work at a lower rate. If they obtain it at such lower rate, those who before obtained the higher rate must go out of employment or submit to receive the lower rate; for the capitalists, who, by the supposition, were gaining no more than the ordinary profits of stock, cannot afford to distribute among the 200, in the shape of wages, more than they distributed among the 150. If by law, or illegal violence, they are compelled to pay the 200 at the same rate that they paid the 150, they will cease to obtain the ordinary profits of stock; some of them will withdraw their capital to districts or occupations in which they can obtain the ordinary profits; and the capital in the disturbed district being reduced while the number of workmen remains the same, they must, in order to retain in the district what capital yet remains, submit to a still greater reduction of wages.

On the other hand, if, when the number of workmen had increased only one-half, the capital of the district had been suddenly doubled; or if, when the capital had increased one-half, the number of workmen had by any accident been reduced one-half, some individual capitalist would be tempted to offer an increased rate of wages in order to keep his capital employed, though perhaps at a reduced rate of profit; and the other capitalists must follow his example or lose their workmen, and with them all return for their capital.

We will now show to how small an extent, and for how short a time, combinations can affect wages in particular trades.

Suppose the journeymen tailors of a given district succeed in compelling the masters to submit to an advance of wages incompatible with the ordinary profits of stock: there is nothing in such a circumstance which can tend to increase the demand for clothes; and if the masters raise the price of the article, the demand must diminish, because fewer persons will be able to give the higher price than were able to give the lower. The advance of wages, therefore, must be deducted from the master's profits; and if by this means their profits be reduced below those of other trades, a portion of the capital employed in the tailors' trade will be transferred gradually to other trades; but though the capital employed in the tailors' trade will be thus diminished, the number of journeymen will remain the same, and in order that the capital which yet remains should produce the same profit as capital invested in other trades, it will be necessary for the journeymen to work at reduced wages, or to starve for want of employment.

In the case above supposed, the profits of the tailors' trade are assumed to have been, at first, upon a level with the profits in other trades. If they were greater, an additional quantity of capital would be determined to the tailors' trade, and that circumstance of itself would, for the reasons we have before stated, raise the rate of wages without a combination.

As for the masters—if population increase faster than capital, there can be no necessity for them to combine to lower wages; in such case, for the reasons we have before stated, wages will fall but too soon, to the lowest point to which they can fall—that which will suffice for the bare existence of the workman.

It has been said, indeed, that where the masters in a trade are few, and the combination among them is perfect, they may, by the aid of the law, repress combination among the workmen, and by dealing with them singly, reduce wages to that rate which will barely support existence, at an earlier period than the state of the population would have produced the same effect, and that they may continue wages at this rate with greater certainty, and for a greater length of time, than if the law had not assisted them. This has been asserted in particular of the type-founders, the saddlers, and the cotton-weavers. Though we should admit the fact to be so in a few instances, and for short periods of time, it seems impossible that it should be so to any great extent, or for any considerable portion of time. If the masters, in such trades, could for any length of time depress wages below the market rate—below the proportion paid in other trades—they would obtain a greater return for their capital than the capitalists enjoyed in other trades: this could not long be kept a secret, and when known, it would attract capital from those other trades to the trades that yielded the greater return; that is, the trades in which the masters had been able to depress wages below the market rate. But as soon as fresh capital should be determined to those trades, the competition between the new capitalists and the old would infallibly raise the rate of wages. The number of workmen would remain the same; the capital employed in the trade would be suddenly increased; and if capital increase faster than population (in which case alone it is possible for wages to rise), no combination of masters can ever hold together. The temptation to employ the increased capital to the best advantage, by competing for workmen, is too strong to be resisted.

Laws, therefore, which prohibit combinations, in the apprehension that such combinations would be able to raise wages above the market price, are, to that end, for the most part, nugatory. But as the existence of such laws leads both masters and men to suppose that wages may be raised by means of combination, they have in truth a very pernicious operation: 1st. By producing and supporting an erroneous opinion, which is the more dangerous, as it leads inquiry astray from the real causes which regulate the rate of wages; 2dly, By occasioning discontent, from an appearance of partiality to the masters; and 3dly, By enfeebling the sanction of law in general.

It seems expedient, therefore, that those enactments should be repealed which interfere with any peaceable mode in which workmen may think fit to conduct themselves, with a view to contracts regarding wages; but it is equally expedient that, like all other men in society, workmen should be subject to the control of the law whenever they attempt to compass their ends by violence or intimidation; and the more so since we have already shown that a temporary success, obtained by forcible means, must, in the long run, defeat the purpose of those who have recourse to them.

Here, then, we have a broad line of distinction: so long as the workmen are misguided enough to suppose that they can better their situation by refusing to work, and by combining for the support of those who thus quit their employment; let no interruption be offered;—the evil is one which must cure itself in a short time, and the parties combining must soon discover that it is neither the law nor the power of their employers which is the cause of their distress. But it is obviously as much to the advantage of the labourer, that he should be secured in the freest exercise of his skill and labour, as it is to that of the capitalist, that he should be secured in the possession and employment of his capital. Neither of them, however, can be said to enjoy this security if they are compelled, by intimidation, to pursue a course which they would not otherwise have pursued. Wherever, therefore, they are exposed to violence or menace, to obstruction, or any kind of molestation, the civil arm ought immediately to be interposed for their protection.

At this stage of the question arises the first difficulty—to define where combination ends and where molestation begins. But a far greater difficulty, and one which seems almost insuperable, is to find a tribunal in which such offences can be fairly and efficiently tried.

The ordinary machinery of circuit or session, would be much too slow and expensive for the suppression of mischief, which calls for immediate interference. The master manufacturers who usually compose the magistracy in the manufacturing districts, and persons who move in the same circle, have evidently a strong interest to decide in favour of the master. It may be urged indeed, that if their proceedings were public, they would act under the check of the press and public opinion; but in general, disputes between a master and his workman on a question of wages, are not subjects which the press is accustomed to handle, because they are not subjects in which the public takes any interest.

If a local jury were summoned periodically for the settling of such disputes, such jury would consist either of masters or of workmen, and in either case would have a strong bias one way.

Perhaps the least objectionable tribunal for such purposes, would be a single professional judge established in such district, who should decide in public, and from whose decision there might be an appeal to the quarter sessions. Such an individual would not be necessarily connected to any extent with the master manufacturers, and he would incur a responsibility, and have a reputation for impartiality to maintain, which is not essential to the well-being of a master manufacturer among his fellow-masters.

Such being the state of the question, and such the difficulties of legislating on the most important branch of it, Mr. Hume, in the session of 1824, introduced an act*, which repealed all acts prohibiting combinations of workmen for the purpose of regulating their contracts respecting wages; or for inducing workmen to depart from a service in which they were engaged,—to quit or return work before it was finished,—to refuse to enter into employment,—or to regulate the mode of carrying on business; and which declared that persons combining for these purposes should not be liable to punishment.

The same exception was extended to masters who should combine to depress wages or to regulate the mode of carrying on business.

But it was enacted, “that if any person “by violence to person or property, by “threats or by intimidation, should wil- “fully and maliciously force” any workmen to leave his service, quit or spoil his work, or destroy machinery, or use violence, threats, or intimidation towards another for not joining in combinations, or should by such means force any master manufacturer to alter his mode of carrying on business, the person so offending should be liable to imprisonment, not exceeding two months, with or without hard labour as the case might require.

The same punishment was prescribed for combining to effect such purposes by such means.

One or two justices of the peace (not being masters in any trade or manufacture, nor the fathers nor sons of masters) were to have jurisdiction to inquire into such offences and to convict on the oath of two witnesses.

This act passed in June 1824.

Shortly after the passing of the act, combinations, before in existence, were acted upon with new vigour in almost every district and every trade throughout the kingdom; not accompanied with that destruction of machinery, and outrage upon individuals which characterised the old Luddite combinations; but with every species of minor annoyance towards the masters who refused to submit, and the workmen who refused to combine. In other respects, the combinations, though general, were characterised by less intimidation than on former occasions; and with respect to one man who was killed in Dublin, it was offered to be proved before the committee of the House of Commons, that his death was not occasioned by the combination. In Liverpool where there had been many and long continued strikes, accompanied by most atrocious conduct and many murders, the combinations, since the repeal, have been perfectly tranquil. The Glasgow strike was not the strike of the men, but of the masters; and the conduct of the men was less violent than on any former occasion. Even the seamen at Newcastle, though three or four of them were shot, were less outrageous than they had ever been in former combinations. In the great strike of the stocking makers, which was only a repetition of that of 1823, no act was committed which called for punishment. As to oaths of a dangerous tendency which had formerly been extensively administered, no sooner was the act repealed than notice was given among those who had been bound by oaths, that oaths were at an end, and that the leaders of the union would denounce any who either gave or took oaths.

Whether these combinations were occasioned by an increased demand for labour, which about that time certainly took place in almost every species of employment, or by a misapprehension of the terms of the act of 1824, it is not now material to inquire, because the combinations have nearly all subsided without any extraordinary intervention of the civil power, and it is probable, that many of those who were engaged in them, have at length discovered their error.

It will not be denied, however, that in many instances they had assumed a very alarming appearance, and it will probably be admitted by all reflecting persons, that every attempt to compass the ends of such combinations by acts of molestation and petty annoyance, ought to be instantly repressed as violence and intimidation: for it is obvious, that by a system of petty annoyance, life may be rendered even more intolerable, than by open and immediate outrage.

The ministers, of the Crown, seem to have conceived, that the word "intimidation" in Mr. Hume's statute, would extend only to such acts as excite fears for personal safety, and that acts of minor annoyance not productive of apprehensions on the score of personal safety, would not be holden to be acts of intimidation.

It is possible the courts might have so construed the statute, though in general it would be thought, that a man acted equally under intimidation, whether he were induced to do what he disliked, or not to do what he liked, from fear of personal violence, or from fear of grievous discomfort. However, to exclude all doubts, Mr. Wallace, last session, brought in a bill to repeal the act of 1824.

This bill also repeals all the acts which prohibit combinations of workmen, for the purpose of regulating their contracts respecting wages.

It further declares that no persons shall be liable to prosecution or penalty, who shall meet together for the sole purpose of consulting upon, and determining the rate of wages which such persons shall demand for their work, or the hours for which they shall work, or who shall enter into any agreement among themselves, for the purpose of fixing the rate of wages or hours during which they shall work.

There is a like declaration as to meetings of masters to regulate wages of journeymen.

It then provides, that "if any person shall by violence to person or property, or by threats or intimidation, or by means tending or in any way obstructing another, force or endeavour to force" any workman to leave his employment, or return work unfinished, or prevent him from hiring himself; or shall use the above means to force any workman to belong to clubs, or to pay fines for not having complied with regulations respecting wages; or shall use such means to force any manufacturer to alter his mode of carrying on business;—the offender shall be imprisoned for any time not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour according to circumstances.

One or two justices of the peace, not being master manufacturers in the trade in which the offence is committed, have jurisdiction to proceed against such offender, and to convict on the oath of one or more witnesses; but they must file the conviction at the quarter-sessions, to which the party convicted has an appeal, and the information must be laid within six months after the offence.

These two latter provisions were added by the Attorney General, and the bill passed in July.

The second act differs so slightly from the first, that it is difficult to account for the acrimony with which the debates on it were conducted. One cannot see why the advocates of the second act should have attacked Mr. Hume with such asperity, nor why those who voted for the first act should so strenuously have opposed the second. The difference between two and three months imprisonment can scarcely be esteemed very material. Judges from the same trade as the offender, are still excluded; and the difference between having them from masters in other trades, or from persons who associate with masters in other trades, seems to us not likely to affect the workman to any assignable extent; but even if the difference were considerable, it seems to us to be more than compensated by the appeal to the quarter-sessions, and the limitation of the prosecution to six months, neither of which provisions are contained in the former act.

As to the permitting a conviction to take place on the oath of one witness, it is absolutely necessary for the purposes of justice. The more aggravated the offence, the less likely is the offender to commit it in the presence of many witnesses; the testimony of one man of character is at least as satisfactory as that of a cloud of ordinary witnesses; and if the single witness be of bad character, it is not compulsory on the magistrate to believe his oath.

In fact the only substantial alteration in the second act, is the making persons answerable for obstruction and molestation, as well as for violence and intimidation.

That they ought to be so answerable, we have already shewn, and the only question remaining is, whether it should be left to the magistrate to determine what shall be deemed obstruction and molestation, or whether the act should enumerate every possible act of molestation that can be imagined.

It seems to us that the words are sufficiently general to include every possible act of the kind that could be imagined or enumerated, and sufficiently precise to restrain the magistrate from punishing for any act which it was not the intention of the legislature to visit with punishment. Let the law be framed in what language it may, considerable discretion must always be left in the hands of those who carry it into execution, and the mischief of attempting to particularize all the acts which the legislature proposes to prohibit, is, that all the books which the world could hold, could not contain them,—that all the imaginations that ever imagined could never imagine them,—and that if one act only were omitted in the catalogue, the careful particularization of all the others would lead to the inference that that one had been omitted designedly. For the purpose therefore of precision as well as of brevity and clearness, it is absolutely necessary that the legislator should speak in the general terms appropriate to the subject of which he is treating.

Courts at Westminster.

THE building of these courts has furnished a striking instance of that want of consideration for the pockets and conveniences of the people, which must always exist where they have no immediate check over their government. Our readers will recollect that about five years ago, the principal courts of justice were pulled down, to make room for the coronation dinner. However, to all who have business to transact in those courts, the annoyance occasioned by their being at a distance from each other, is so great, that it was hoped they would soon be restored to Westminster Hall. The quantity of building requisite was not great, and it was remembered that the largest theatres had been reconstructed, for the purpose of mere amusement, within three months after their destruction by fire. Five years, however, have now elapsed (December 1825), and the Court of King's Bench is still relegated to the Sessions House, Westminster, the Court of Chancery to the precincts of Lincoln's Inn. Such is the speed at which public affairs travel in comparison with private. Next for a comparison of the expense. The new Court of King's Bench, adjoining Westminster Hall, was no sooner erected than certain gentlemen of taste denounced it in the House of Commons as an outrage upon what is called good taste in building. The matter was referred to a committee: by order of that committee, the nearly completed edifice was pulled down, in order to be recommenced, and stones which had cost ten shillings and expense a foot in the erection, were sold, as we have been informed, at a shilling and at sixpence a foot, as old materials, upon the destruction of the building. After all this outlay upon the appearance, it might have been expected that some little attention would have been paid to the convenience of the structure. Instead of this, upon its second resurrection, it was found so small, and so little adapted to the purposes to which it was destined, that Mr. Scarlett made a public complaint, and threatened to make a motion on the subject in parliament. The chancellor of the Exchequer promised to investigate the matter himself, and to make the best arrangement he could. The architect, it seems, who had been employed in the business, had made a very natural blunder, which admitted, however, of a cheap and easy remedy. In taking his survey of the old courts, for the purpose of constructing new ones, he perceived that the Court of Exchequer occupied the greatest space, and not adverting to the fact, that that court is almost destitute of suitors, while neither time nor space sufficient can be found for those who throng the King's Bench, he determined to make the new Exchequer, like the old, the largest of all the courts. In order to effect this, he was obliged to encroach on the site destined for the King's Bench, which was rendered, in consequence, so small and inadequate to its purpose as to call for Mr. Scarlett's complaint. The evil might have easily and cheaply have been remedied, if the architect, even then, would have assigned to the Exchequer the site appropriated to the King's Bench, and to the King's Bench the site appropriated to the Exchequer. Instead of this, he chose, as we have been informed, to pull down the interior of the King's Bench, a second time, and rebuild it a third. What the erection of the court has cost altogether, under these circumstances, and what has been the architect's per centage upon the expence, it is impossible for us to guess; but the court is, after all, dark, contracted, and inconvenient, to a degree scarcely credible by those who have not seen it. No separate approach for witnesses;—no separate approach for jurors; all who have business to transact, must fight their way through the crowd of persons who cover the floor at the two sides of the court. The whole space is so contracted for the numbers who have to breathe in it, that in cold weather the most fetid air must be inhaled a thousand times over, or the persons present be exposed to draughts and intolerable cold.

We are satisfied that it will be difficult to carry on in this edifice the business of the chief tribunal in the land, and we trust some competent person will bring the subject before parliament early in the next session. The facts we have stated speak for themselves, and require no comment from us; we believe they cannot be denied or varied in substance.

We ought not to omit stating, that in the construction of the new Court of King's Bench, there is one good feature which has never existed in any of its predecessors—a gallery for the accommodation of the public. It will hold from 60 to 90 persons, who may see and hear all that passes; and are at the same time so placed, as to offer no obstruction to the business of the court.

The importance of publicity, as a sanction for judicial integrity: the importance of familiarizing the people with the business of courts of justice; the convenience of finding a place for suitors and witnesses, whose turn is next on the list, are matters which have hitherto been strangely forgotten, in most of our metropolitan courts. Scarcely any of them afford any accommodation except for "gentlemen of the bar," and it is no small palliation of all the errors of the present architect, that he seems to have been the first who has had any consideration for the public. When we consider the instruction which may be obtained in our courts of justice, and the interest which every man has in learning whenever he can the latest exposition of that oral law which is said to reside in the judge's breast, it is obvious that the size of our principal courts of justice ought only to be limited by the space within which an ordinary speaker can conveniently be heard throughout. In the instance of the Opera House, it has been ascertained how ample a scope may be given, provided a building be constructed with any due regard to the principles of acoustics. There are, also, many provincial courts, from which our London architects might do well to take a lesson. In the West alone, at Winchester, Dorchester, Exeter, Bridgewater, Taunton, Wells, there is excellent accommodation, with seats for many hundred spectators; they have separate passages to approach their station, and are so placed as not in the least to interfere with the dispatch of business.

We would also suggest, as a great improvement, the propriety of placing all the courts of justice in or near Lincoln's Inn Fields. The time lost, and the expense occasioned by daily journeys to Westminster Hall, so far from the centre of all ordinary, as well as juridical business, is a serious and useless tax upon the profession and the public. We fear, however, we shall have few to support us in this proposal. The prestige of antiquity operates so powerfully upon mankind in general, that there are few who would sacrifice, even to their daily convenience, the superstition which attaches them to a Gothic building.

Salaries of the Judges and Police Magistrates.

As we approve, in the main, of the increase which has been made in the judges' salaries, it might be deemed superfluous on our parts to enter into any detailed exposition of the principles which ought to regulate the payment of public functionaries; but the importance of the subject, and the high respect we entertain for many of those who differ from us, demand at our hands something like an examination of the question.

The subject must be considered under two heads; the mode of payment and the amount; but the mode of payment involves by far the more difficult branch of the question.

As a general principle it may be assumed that the mode of payment ought, if possible, to be such as to make the interest of the functionary coincide with his duty; the application, however, of this principle in the present state of our judicial establishment, is by no means easy. Give a judge a fixed annual salary, and, like all other functionaries paid in the same manner, secure of his stipend at all events, he has an obvious interest in abridging the discharge of his duty: pay him by fees on each suit, and he has an interest as decisive in the number and protraction of suits: on the other hand, let him receive a ticket for each day's attendance, and let the amount of his salary at the quarter's end depend upon the number of tickets he can produce; instead of taking his daily station with listlessness or disgust, and looking about to find excuses for occasional absence, he might mount the bench with a feeling of pleasure, and carefully avoid all motives for non-attendance. But a contrivance of this nature is almost superfluous where, as in the Court of King's bench, the pressure of business is such as to compel an attendance as close as human strength can bear; and perhaps the check of constant publicity may be sufficient to insure an adequate discharge of duty, notwithstanding the functionary be paid by a fixed salary.

Be this as it may, the mode of paying a judge by fees on each suit or stage of a suit, or by the patronage of offices which are supported by similar fees, is clearly the worst that could be devised. It gives him an interest (almost irresistible) in the number and protraction of suits: it gives him an interest in overlooking the extortion and other misconduct of his subordinates—for if they have purchased their places it would be a kind of breach of contract to prevent them from profiting to the utmost—if they have received them gratuitously, they are generally friends or acquaintances, whom he would be loth to expose; it weakens the sanction of law in general, by inviting imputations on the integrity of those who are employed in the administration of justice: but above all by raising the price of justice, and virtually closing the doors of the court against the great mass of the community, it operates as a premium upon injustice, and as far as the absence of law can contribute to so sad a result, tends directly to the demoralization of society at large.

Upon whatever grounds, therefore, or from whatever motives the change may have been produced, we rejoice in the abolition of this mode of payment. It is at least one step towards a better distribution of justice.

But with a view to elucidate the nature of our system of government, it is curious and instructive to examine the reasons assigned for the alteration in question. In the view of those who think that the object of all government ought to be the greatest happiness of the greatest number, the paramount objection to paying judges or their officers by fees, is the consequent denial of justice to millions who are unable to pay the fees, and the torments occasioned by the success of injustice. Mr. Robinson, one of the ablest and most upright ministers this country has ever had, one who has already done more good than all his predecessors put together, assigns three reasons for altering this mode of payment*.

1. "The sale of offices by judges does not tend to add any thing to the dignity of their judicial character." 2. "The emolument derived from the practice is uncertain: a man may come to the Chief Justiceship at an advanced period of life, and find all the offices of which he has the disposal filled by persons younger than himself." 3. "The receipt of fees by the judges is wholly unbecoming their situation: it might happen that a suitor might refuse to pay his fees, and it might be absolutely necessary for the judge to take steps to enforce payment, or forfeit that from which a portion of his income was derived: this, it must be admitted, was placing the learned person in a painful and delicate situation."

The only motive assigned for the measure in hand, is sympathy for the twelve learned persons receivers of the fees, who may occasionally be placed in a painful and delicate situation, and for the two learned persons whose emoluments are uncertain. But the misery and deprivation occasioned to twelve millions of people, the payers, by the exaction of these fees, entirely escape the right honourable gentleman's observation. "With the fees themselves he does not propose to deal; they will be collected, as heretofore, by the present officers, and paid into the Exchequer, to form a fund, out of which, part of the increased expences of the new arrangement may be defrayed*." So that the judges are still, in effect, to be paid by fees! But like the gentlemen of the bar, instead of receiving them at once from the dirty hands of the client, their dignity is to be appeased by the double strainer of attorney and clerk.

Money can readily enough be appropriated to the erection (repair, it is called) of a palace for the great person who appoints the minister; to the building of museums and the purchase of collections of pictures appreciable only by the class in which the minister lives. But money for the payment of judges?—No! Although the provision for all of them would not exceed the income of an Irish Arch-bishop, the fund must be wrung from the hands of miserable suitors already smarting under the torments of injustice. Aye, and if it cannot be wrung where it does not exist, justice must be denied, and injustice prevail. The rt. hon. gent. supposes the case of a suitor refusing to pay his fees; but there are thousands unable to pay them. The rt. hon. gent. supposes that a judge might be placed in a painful and delicate situation if he were to attempt to enforce payment under such circumstances. No less than fifty-two officers of justice are actually placed in this delicate situation four times in every year:—The clerks or deputy clerks of the peace of each county:—but as they are in a lower sphere than the judges,—commonly attorneys,—their sensations are not sufficiently acute to have excited the attention of the Legislature.—The matter stands thus: every person who is charged at the Quarter Sessions with a misdemeanor, such as a common assault, or the like, is required, as a condition precedent to taking his trial, to pay to the clerk of the peace a fee or fees amounting to about 3l. 16s. 4d. The defendant may be altogether innocent of the charge alleged against him; he may be, and often is, utterly destitute of money;—no matter; he must pay the fee in order to enter on his defence, or in default of payment be committed to prison or find sureties till the next Quarter Sessions, and so on till he procures the money. And yet this is what the opulent, the vulgar, the ignorant, and Blackstone, call an equal administration of justice.

But to return. During three or four centuries, so long as the people, brutal and uninstructed, were either ignorant or regardless of this exaction of fees for the payment of the judges; so long as the judges could receive them without remark or inconvenience; so long the legislature is quiescent;—The people open their eyes and read, an active press calls attention to the subject, and the judges, the objects of painful remark, complain of being the instruments of these impolitic exactions. The judges are instantly relieved from their "painful and delicate situation," from the possibility of a little sentimental suffering;—but the people, who in comparison with the judges, substantially suffer in the proportion of one million to one, are left to endure their sufferings as they may. However, we do not despair: let the people read a little more; let them think a little more, and above all, let them cease to degrade and brutalize themselves by increasing their numbers beyond the amount at which capitalists must compete for workmen instead of workmen competing for employment, and they may still hope to enforce a juster view of the ends of government. In these observations we are far from imputing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer any intention to overlook or oppress the great body of the people: we set out by stating that the view we have taken of the subject had probably escaped his observation: we are satisfied that he possesses more integrity and a greater disposition to do good than any of his predecessors; and we confidently expect that when an evil is clearly pointed out he will not be slow in attempting to remove it; but we charge him in common with all his class, in thinking, feeling, and acting chiefly for gentlemen, and in losing sight to a great degree, of the great mass of mankind. This failing, this contraction of legislative views, is the almost unavoidable result of the education and habits of men of rank: their apartments look out from the Corinthian capitals of society; they see only the loftier trees which surround the building, and forget the grass and bushes below. Such a failing might be of no importance in former times, when the great mass of the community were too ignorant to know, and too feeble to enforce their own claims; but the legislator who would succeed in a country where education and political intelligence are widely diffused, where mechanics' institutions start up in every town, and newspapers are read in every village, must expand his views and endeavour equally to promote the interests of all.

We come now to the amount of the salaries. It will probably be conceded, even by those who think the new scale too high, that the services of public functionaries ought to be paid for on the same principle as any merchantable commodity; namely, at the lowest price at which the best of its kind can be obtained. The public is made up of individuals, and this is the rule which every prudent individual pursues without scruple.

The sum now fixed for the nine puisne judges is 5,500*l.* a-year, during actual service, and 2,800 for pensions of retreat. Whatever might be the case under a different system of jurisprudence, or a different organization of the judicial establishment, we do not think, under the existing system, that the services of the most competent individuals, could be obtained for a less sum. This is obviously rather a guess, than an opinion formed from facts; for the experiments which might have furnished the materials for a decisive opinion, have rarely indeed been made. Of course the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, are under a kind of moral compulsion to affirm that the appointments sanctioned by them or their predecessors, were the best possible that circumstances admitted; that they have been occasioned by nothing but a desire for the public good; that the existing judges, like all existing public functionaries, are the most active, the most acute, the most learned that ever were seen, in short, the very perfection of judges; but we, who are under no such compulsion, may perhaps be permitted to form a different estimate.

The qualities mainly desirable in a judge, are a vigorous and logical intellect, accurate knowledge of the law, and a constitution unimpaired by age; but appointments of men possessing such qualities, have been rare in the extreme, and if those in whom the power of nomination is vested, have not been actuated by motives of personal favour, they seem to have esteemed age, feebleness, or bigotry as the best recommendations for office. In more than one instance, judges have been made upon compassion. A man of very ordinary capacity and attainments, has through the favour of attorneys or friends, or the imposture of a grave demeanour, enjoyed a certain portion of professional emolument: on a sudden he is shouldered out of practice by younger, and more able competitors: a chancellor, the friend and companion of his youth, in order to extricate him from the mortification of sitting at the table of the court, with an empty brief-bag and sour visage, causes him to be made a judge. The misery he would have experienced through his declining years, is, certainly, thus avoided; but in lieu of it, a mass of misery is created a thousand fold greater. The new Rhadamanthus, elate with the dignity of his office (for other dignity he possesses none), struts his brief hour, reprimands under-sheriffs, fines javelin-men, and resolutely enforces silence; but as for enforcing or applying law, he is as little competent to the task as the javelin-men he has fined; his head is a confused medley of shreds and patches of cases, chiefly those in which he has himself been engaged, and which, on all occasions, he cites and misapplies; general principles he is incapable of comprehending, and still more incapable of applying, and in every quarter, by misdecision, and misdirection, he aggravates all the evils of our dilatory and costly jurisprudence; wretches who have commenced suits for the recovery of their rights, under the best auspices, and best advice, are involved in hopeless ruin, by the delay and expense of new trials, which an abler judge would have avoided, and his whole course, from the commencement to the termination of circuit, is productive of misery and disappointment. In the spirit of our government, the creators of such a judge, in their sympathy for a man of their own class and acquaintance, have overlooked or disregarded the torments they inflict on thousands less immediately before them.

But supposing that public opinion were strong enough to enforce a greater degree of discernment and integrity in the appointment of judges, supposing them to be chosen from the best qualified class of barristers, it is clear, that in order to induce them to accept the appointment, the salary must be equal, or nearly equal to the income they can obtain at the bar. Something may be abandoned for the honor, something for the certainty of the provision, and something perhaps for a little diminution of the amount of professional exertion; but a man with a family, will not choose to relinquish much. Now an able counsel, in the vigour of his life, whose opinions on professional questions are esteemed of value, who has industry to acquire legal knowledge, and acuteness to apply it in argument, can generally command from 4 to 6,000*l.* a-year, and has a right to look forward to more; and though applications to such men to become judges have been rare, one at least, the late Mr. J. Dampier, refused the appointment under the late scale of salary, until ill health disabled him from labouring as an advocate. We think, therefore, that competent persons between the ages of thirty and fifty, would not, in general, accept the situation for a less salary than that which has been at present established for the puisne judges. For the chief justiceship of the King's Bench, the highest judicial talent that the bar can furnish, ought to be obtained, and if there have been many instances, as we think there have, in which talent of this kind (as in the case of the late Lord Ellenborough, or Sir S. Romilly) has been able to command 10,000*l.* a year at the bar, it would be inexpedient to fix the salary at less; but it certainly ought not, as some have suggested, to be raised higher, because some kinds of talent have produced a greater amount of income. The talent which is best adapted for the office of judge—extensive legal attainment, united with a clear logical intellect,—does not constitute that which is usually most successful at the bar. The bullying, browbeating, Nisi Prius advocate, obtains much the larger share of fame and money; but it would be impossible to find an individual less fitted for the judicial functions. Ignorant as he is of all law, except the narrow and mischievous rules which effect the exclusion of evidence, constantly addressing himself to the passions and the prejudices of juries, and succeeding with them because he is as prejudiced and ill-instructed as they, his life may be said to constitute one long trick. To see him winking at the foreman of the jury, shrugging his shoulders, and making undertoned observations during his opponent's speech, one would think him better fitted to play a part in a farce, than in the grave administration of justice; justice, indeed, or injustice, truth or falsehood, must be to him matters of complete indifference, his only object being, per fas aut nefas, to succeed in the cause and obtain another brief from the attorney who employs him. Such a man, notwithstanding his 12,000*l.* a-year, ought, we think, to be excluded from the list of competitors for the office of judge, and if so, there can be little doubt of obtaining a Chief Justice for 10,000*l.* a-year.

With respect to the 8000*l.* a-year for the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas, that sum seems to have been now fixed as a compensation for certain patronage of which the present chief justice has been divested; but it will be a large salary for his successor, unless the constitution of the court be altered and its business much increased. Upon what ground, however, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer should receive 7000*l.* a-year when the Vice Chancellor has only 6000*l.* we are unable to comprehend, unless we may be permitted to call the affair a job. But for the circuit, the Chief Baron's office as compared with that of other judges, is nearly a sinecure, while the Vice Chancellor is constantly employed in the most laborious and important duties. The lawyers, indeed, who have a natural antipathy to any thing new, who have an interest opposed to the dispatch of business, and who, as they all expect to be Chancellors, deprecate the transfer of any portion of the Chancellor's power and jurisdiction, speak slightly enough of this office of Vice Chancellor: Mr. Denman, in the course of the debate, styles it with a sneer, "that creation of an act of parliament*," as if an act of parliament were not an act of the legislature, and as if all the courts of justice had not been the creations of the legislature for the time being; but the ministers, who are men of business, and not lawyers or antiquarians, can scarcely be so childish as to measure their estimation of a court by its novelty or antiquity, to assign 7000*l.* a-year to the Exchequer because it is the oldest, and only 6000*l.* to the Vice Chancery because it is the newest of our tribunals; on that principle they might assign, with equal propriety, 7000*l.* to the Court of Pie Poudre. The solution of the mystery may be left to the ingenuity of the reader.

With respect to the police magistrates, the increase of their salaries was, upon Mr. Peel's statement, altogether unjustifiable. According to him those magistrates, like all official persons, are the very essence of perfection. Nothing can equal their industry, ability, and integrity†. Now if it were true that persons so unexceptionable and accomplished could be found to transact the business of the police offices at 600*l.* a-year, it was, according to our principles, a barefaced robbery to make the public pay 800*l.* But Mr. Peel, like his colleague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaks in these matters under a kind of compulsion. It would be awkward to charge with incapability the functionaries under his department unless he intended to dismiss them. He evidently was caught in a dilemma, and we will not be uncandid enough to take advantage of his distress. The truth is, and Mr. Peel knows it as well as any body, that the police magistrates are not of the essence of perfection, and he must have been grieved at their frequent exhibitions of weakness and incapacity. This we ascribe in the main to the circumstance, that a sufficient number of competent persons could not be induced to offer themselves for the service at a salary of 600*l.* a-year. The immense business of the metropolis gives rise to a number of police cases far too complicated for the attainments and capacity of an ordinary justice of the peace. Some knowledge of the mysteries of law is undoubtedly requisite for a police magistrate, together with a considerable proportion of industry, patience, and discernment. Now the lawyer who possesses these qualifications has, at least, a fair chance of attaining 800*l.* a-year by the pursuit of his profession, and considering the length and expense of his education, it is not likely that he will forego his hopes of ultimate success for a smaller consideration. We believe that, till within a recent period, competent persons were not frequently in the habit of offering their services, and that the appointments, such as they have been, have for the most part been as good as circumstances would admit. It is true, that occasionally most efficient and upright magistrates (such as Mr. Colquhoun) were obtained at the low stipend of 400*l.* a-year; but our proposition is, not that no competent person will offer himself for such a sum, but that a sufficient number will not offer themselves. Undoubtedly, in making the salary worth the acceptance of a man of talents, there is also danger of its becoming worth the acceptance of a scion of the aristocracy, and of the whole of the appointments becoming a job under the almost irresistible influence of that prodigal portion of the community; so that we are driven to the unhappy alternative of deterring competent persons from offering their services, or of incurring the risk of seeing them excluded by ignorant and worthless favorites. Of the two, we prefer incurring the risk, diminished as we trust it may be by the increasing power of the public press and public opinion, and by the possible introduction of checks against abuse. If competent persons cannot be induced even to offer their services, the evil is certain and irremediable.

We shall now examine a few of the arguments which have been adduced in support of and in opposition to these measures.

According to Mr. Peel and Mr. Scarlett, a main reason for raising the salaries of the judges, is to sustain the dignity of those high functionaries‡. Dignity is a word which no doubt has a received meaning; but there are many persons who may feel somewhat at a loss to comprehend its true import. For our own parts, we never could determine whether it meant a coach and six,—a house in Grosvenor Square,—a solemn and sour visage,—or an extra quantity of horse-hair grease and flour for the frame of such visage. But of this we are certain, that we never hear the word without a shudder of apprehension. It is a mode of address as sure to be followed by a demand on the purse of the bearer as the presentation of the highwayman's pistol, and like the report of that pistol, two often deprives its victim of all power of reply. Dignity of the crown, dignity of the bench, dignity of the church! who will say that such dignities or dignitaries ought not to be well paid in order to support their dignity? Lord Ellenborough affirms it is expedient to raise the chief justice to the dignity of the peerage, in order that he may assist the House of Lords in its judicial capacity; and if so, it is quite clear that he ought to have a salary proportioned to the dignity of the house*.

Unfortunately, whatever be the meaning of the word, the thing, dignity, pre-eminently tends to disqualify the possessor of it, for the discharge of his duty. The most important part of it, often becomes beneath his dignity, and must be committed to a deputy or secretary.

Mr. Peel also, in the first debate, says (in all simplicity, no doubt), that the consequence of the judge's emoluments not exceeding 3,200*l.* a-year, was, that during the last 25 years, scarcely any judge had been appointed to the office until he had turned 60 years of age†. Whatever might have been the case, had the appointments been offered to competent men, the actual appointments have no more been the consequence of the low salaries, than they have been the consequence of the pepper-box at the top of Westminster-Hall. But the instances in which they have been offered to competent men in the vigour of life being rare indeed, Mr. Peel can have no just grounds for the assertion he has made. Dr. Lushington, with equal simplicity, insinuates, that the lawyers are incompetent to take care of their own interests—that they are too prone to undervalue money—and that they ought not to be permitted to make the sacrifice of accepting honour in lieu of salary‡. If this new light had not been imparted to us, we confess we should have imagined that persons appointed to offices of which the incidents were generally known, might be at least permitted to determine for themselves, whether or not it suited them to take, as the payment of their services, money, house, candles, coals, or honour, as the case may be; unless indeed, where the appointment, like that of sailors pressed into the King's service is one, which they cannot conveniently decline. Mr. Searlett, whom nothing can move to give an opinion about the puisne judge-ships, has started a curious theory with respect to the chief justiceship§. He holds the profession of the law to be a great lottery, into which adventurers are tempted, mainly by the magnitude of the chief prize, and that if that prize, independently of its value in the shape of glory, should not produce 12,000*l.* a-year, there might very soon be wanting a due supply of good men to serve litigants in Westminster Hall and on the Northern circuit. We cannot entirely agree with the learned gentleman, for though, no doubt, a modest aspirant here and there may confidently expect the seals, from the moment he enters a special pleader's office, we believe the great body of lawyers enter and pursue the profession with the humbler object of earning their daily bread.

Mr. Searlett's reason, however, for raising the salary of the chief justice, is nothing, when compared with one of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's reasons for raising that of the chief justice of the Common Pleas||. The rt. hon. gent. admitting that the practice of promoting judges from one rank to another is not altogether calculated to promote that independence of the crown so much vaunted and so little existing, enumerates among the advantages of an increased salary that it will tend to check too violent aspirations after preferment. An admirable cure for the evil, truly! As if the preferment of a judge depended upon the violence of his aspirations for it! As if the will, the power, and the interests of those who promote him had nothing to do with the matter! As if a judge, who only charged a jury fairly upon the trial of a political offender, might not aspire till his heart broke with disappointment, though his aptitude, integrity, and kindness, were the theme of universal admiration! Besides, who among the least versed in human nature ever dreamt that ambition would be checked or sated by acquirement?—Every child has learned that the thirsty aspirants after wealth or honours, quo plus meat poti plus sitiuntur; and it may be deemed about as probable that oil will extinguish a fire, as that the accession of wealth will assuage the desire for more. This business of the promotion of the judges, is, indeed, a difficult matter to handle in the present state of our judicial institutions. Mr. Brougham proposed, as a kind of check, that the house should come to a resolution that such promotion was inexpedient. An express provision, prohibiting such promotion, might often deprive a good man of his reward, and the country of his services; while the provision would, after all, be inefficient, unless it also prohibited the preferment of a judge's friends and relations to the tenth degree; but a mere resolution, declaring the inexpediency of the practice, would add scarcely any thing to the small control which public opinion contrives to maintain over the matter. This, after all, and the vigilance of a public press, seems to be the only corrective the evil admits of, so long as the appointment of judges is vested in the Crown.

The arguments urged in opposition to the measure, having in effect, been considered in the beginning of this article, need not here occupy us at any length. Lord Ellenborough persists that there is nothing like fees to make judges work, and that if they are paid by salary instead, a double number of them will be requisite to perform the same quantity of labour*. The preponderating objections to this mode of payment we have already shewn, but his lordship, no doubt, has cogent reasons for viewing the matter in a different light.

Mr. Brougham, Mr. Denman, Mr. J. Williams, and Mr. Hume, opposed any increase to the salaries of the puisne judges, on the ground that no instances were adduced of competent persons in the prime of life having declined the station on account of the inadequacy of the salary†.—But the argument is not worth much unless accompanied with the fact that there are many such persons to whom the station has been offered.—Confining ourselves to the present century, we are satisfied that the fact is otherwise.

Mr. Denman urged also, that alteration from time to time in the salaries of the judges, especially at the instance of the Crown, was incompatible with their dignity, and subversive of their independence. Dignity, for aught we know, may by judges be esteemed a more indispensable endowment than salary; but the learned gent.'s argument, if pushed to its consequences, would reduce the salary to at least what it was in the time of Edward III., probably about 6d. a-day; and as the Crown has the payment as well as the appointment of the judges, whatever might become of their independence, it is easy to guess what would become of their existence if the salary were to remain stationary through several centuries. The learned gent., however, has an argument which, with regard to the present judges, is at least as conclusive. He is certain they do not desire any increase. How he arrived at this certainty, we are entirely at a loss to comprehend, for were their lordships to swear it upon cross-examination in a witness-box, we should believe them to the same extent that we believe a bishop elect when he cries Nolo episcopari‡.

In the course of the debate, some matters were touched on incidentally, which must ere long form the subject of a legislative measure, and therefore we shall only advert to it here. It was suggested by Dr. Lushington, that much time might be saved to the courts at Westminster, by enabling a judge to pass sentence at the assize in cases of misdemeanor, as well as in cases of felony. At present, when an offender is convicted at the assizes, of a misdemeanor, such as smuggling, molesting custom-house officers, &c., instead of being sentenced on the spot, he is brought up the next term, at an immense expense and inconvenience, it may be from Cumberland or Cornwall, to receive sentence in full court at Westminster. To this extent his punishment is always aggravated beyond its due measure, and hours and days which ought to be devoted by the court to more important business, are consumed in hearing affidavits and exculpatory speeches. In whatever way the practice originated, not a single reason can be adduced for the continuance of this absurd anomaly. The single judge who is entrusted with passing sentence of death for burglary or murder, may surely be entrusted with the punishment for an assault, or a breach of fiscal regulations.

Another grievance incident to the trial of the heterogeneous offences which are technically but most absurdly and illogically all lumped together under the denomination of misdemeanor, is the judge's inability to order the prosecutor's expences, as in cases of felony, to be borne by the county.

On account of the impossibility of sustaining this expence, prosecutors are frequently prevented from coming forward in the most aggravated cases. Take the case of rape: in many instances of the most cruel and brutal violation, the victim, from extreme childhood, ignorance, or modesty, is often unable to state that technical completion of the offence which constitutes a capital felony, and the only course is to prosecute the offender for what is called the misdemeanor of attempting to commit the capital offence.—These technically styled attempts, are generally among the very worst cases that come before our criminal tribunals. The victims are often indigent persons—they incur great expence and loss, and are frequently unable to pursue the offender, unless the parish officers will come forward and pay for the prosecution. A bill, enabling the judges to order the prosecutor's expences to be sustained by the county in aggravated cases of misdemeanor, would receive the support of every one acquainted with the details of a court of justice.

Mr. Kenrick.

THIS case, which occupied a considerable portion of the time and attention of the House of Commons, stands briefly as follows. In the month of May, 1824, Martin Canfor, a farmer, lost from Charlwood Common, in Surry, about twenty sheep; one of which was a ram, marked on the fleece with a peculiar composition. After considerable search for a week, he found some of the sheep on Westwood Common, about five or six miles from Charlwood; and, having been told, by one Huggins, that William Beale, who used to turn sheep on Westwood Common, had been seen leading the ram in a string, he proceeded to Beale's farm, about four miles from Westwood. Here he found the ram, newly shorn, in a fold with Beale's sheep, which were shorn also. Beale, upon being questioned, said he had bought the ram some time before; and being requested to produce the fleece, refused to do so.

Canfor then proceeded to Mr. Kenrick, and solicited a search warrant for the fleece, saying he had seen the ram, which he would swear to, in the possession of Beale; but he omitted to state that he had heard Beale had been seen leading the ram in a string.

Mr. Kenrick declined taking Canfor's deposition on oath, and, instead of granting a search warrant, wrote to Beale the following note, which he directed Canfor to convey to him:—

"These are to request that you will deliver to the bearer the fleece of a sheep admitted to have been taken by you from Westwood, in order that it may be produced in evidence before me on a charge of felony; or bring it with you to my house, and shew cause why you should not do so.

"To William Beale."

William Beale was brother of Mr. Kenrick's bailiff.

Canfor represented that Beale would pay no attention to such a paper, and again requested a warrant. Mr. Kenrick flew in a passion, and ordered him out of the room. Canfor proceeded to Beale, who again refusing to deliver the fleece, Canfor applied for a search warrant to another magistrate; but he declined interfering, after Mr. Kenrick had acted in the business. The next day, Canfor returned to Mr. Kenrick's, where he saw William Beale, conversing with his brother, Mr. Kenrick's bailiff: he again asked for the fleece, when Beale said, "I'll see 'it out with you;" and both he and his brother laughed. A servant of Mr. Kenrick's then informed Canfor, that the whole business had been referred to two neighbouring farmers. Before them Beale produced the fleece, and they decided it to be the property of Canfor. Canfor then went in to Mr. Kenrick with the fleece, to report what had happened; when Mr. Kenrick, ordering his servant to shut the door, appointed him a special constable to search Canfor, and take from him the note which Mr. Kenrick had addressed to Beale. Canfor refusing to surrender it, the parish constable was called in, and the note and fleece were both taken from Canfor. For this treatment he brought his action against Mr. Kenrick; and the cause coming on for trial at the Surry assizes, Mr. Kenrick, by his counsel, consented to pay 5*l.* damages and all costs.

Mr. Kenrick's defence was, that the property being contested, he had detained the fleece with a view to restoring it to the person to whom it should ultimately be found to belong.

In addition to this case, Mr. Denman proposed also to bring forward a charge of misconduct against Mr. Kenrick, in certain transactions concerning one William Franks; and he moved for, and obtained copies of certain affidavits filed in the Court of King's Bench, in some proceedings arising out of those transactions: but the house objecting to mix up this matter with the charge in respect of Canfor, Mr. Denman postponed the further consideration of it to the next session.

With respect to Canfor's business, after he had been examined at great length, Mr. Denman moved that the committee should come to a resolution. "That Mr. Kenrick appears to have neglected his duty as a magistrate, in not inquiring into facts of a suspicious character; and that his subsequent conduct in causing Canfor to be arrested and searched, was illegal, arbitrary, and oppressive, and a gross abuse of his authority as a magistrate."

Mr. Peel and Mr. Canning opposed this resolution, on the ground that it would be nugatory, unless followed up by an address to the King for the removal of Mr. Kenrick; that such a step, even admitting Mr. Kenrick to have exhibited indiscretion and want of temper in Canfor's case, (and no other was before the house), would be a very disproportionate visitation even for the full extent of the failing, especially after he had suffered by paying the costs of an action; and that, upon the whole, sufficient ground had not been laid for the interference of the house.

We view the case in the same light.

Considering that the ram was turned on a common, whence it might easily have strayed; considering that Beale was a farmer with some property and many sheep, and not likely to have been tempted by inducement to the commission of theft; considering that, instead of manifesting any indications of furtiveness, he openly asserted a property in the ram; we think the magistrate exercised a proper discretion in hesitating to blast the character of a respectable man, by granting a search warrant under such circumstances. In his subsequent conduct he certainly betrayed considerable weakness; such weakness as to provoke the observation that a man with so little capacity for the office could never have been appointed a judge, except by means of sinister influence. But, however this may be, it would seem a rigorous exercise of power, to dismiss a public officer from his station merely on account of occasional weakness.

What may be the result of the investigation of Franks's case, it is impossible for us to foresee. Unless, however, we have been greatly deceived, it will turn out to be a business very different from that of Canfor's.

Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords.

WHEN James the First asked Lord Coke, why, if the law were, as Coke asserted, the perfection of reason, his majesty might not take his seat on the bench and distribute justice with as much success as any of the judges; Lord Coke told him, that the reason of the law was a technical reason, with which his majesty could not have had the means of becoming acquainted. If this might be said to a king, two hundred years ago, we think we may, without offence, regret at this day, that the House of Lords should still continue to be a tribunal of justice, and the highest tribunal in the kingdom. To decide in cases of appeal, which are supposed to have in them more than ordinary difficulty, is not an easy thing, even for those who have spent a whole life in the exclusive study and practice of jurisprudence, but to those who have never been at much pains to acquire a knowledge of law, it must be in a great degree, a matter of hazard whether in any case before them they decide right or wrong.

It will never be contended that any man can acquire by inheritance the knowledge requisite for a judge, and it can scarcely be expected that an individual who is under no responsibility for his decision, will have any motives for entering into a study, of all others the most extensive, difficult, and repulsive. It is true that the House is assisted in these matters by the Lord Chancellor, or his deputy; but if they are implicitly to follow the opinions of those learned persons, the appeal might be directed to those persons alone, and the House of Lords be saved the trouble and inconvenience attendant on its decision. If the House does not follow such opinion, they have at least the power, (we are far from imputing to them the will), to decide erroneously.

Therefore it is, that among those who are most attached to the constitution of this House, as far as regards its legislative functions, there are many who regret that it should still retain a jurisdiction, which adds neither to its respectability nor power, but casts on it a considerable burden, without any correspondent advantage to itself or the public; and this impression has been rather strengthened than otherwise, by the arrangements which Lord Liverpool announces, with so much apparent satisfaction, for disposing of appeals; disposing, is the word employed by his Lordship; and upon his own shewing, we think it appears pretty clearly that they are not decided by any member of the house, except Lord Gifford.

Considerable difficulty having been experienced for many years, in securing the constant attendance of the number of lords necessary to form a court, and the number of appeals having increased to such an amount that many years would have been necessary for the hearing of them, to say nothing of fresh accessions to the list, a resolution was adopted by the House, under which, the quorum, or number necessary to constitute a court, are compelled to attend not from the beginning to the end of a cause, or number of causes, but day after day in a certain rotation; so that frequently lord A hears the plaintiff's case, lord B the defendant's, and lord C, who has heard neither, decides! This outdoes the worst that ever has been charged against the judges on the other side of the Styx. "Castigatque auditque dolos." Rhadamanthus, though he occasionally carried his judgment into execution first, would sometimes hear the cause afterwards; but lord C decides, and never hears at all. And this mode of administering justice, or, to use the more appropriate phrase, disposing of causes, Lord Liverpool, to our surprise, describes to the House as a subject of congratulation. To such inconsistencies may even good and able men be reconciled by custom and establishment.

It is not our purpose, at present, to enter further into the subject, or to expatiate upon the objections to uniting in the same persons the incompatible functions of judge and legislator. If his lordship is serious in wishing to improve the administration of justice in the last resort, let him think of establishing a metropolitan court of final appeal, which shall have no other duties to attend to; which shall relieve the House of Lords from the performance of a task, which that House has neither leisure nor legal knowledge aptly to perform, and which shall leave it unembarrassed to its own province of legislation.

County Courts' Bill.

NOTWITHSTANDING the loud and repeated boasts touching the equal administration of justice in England, it is a fact as painful as indisputable, that a very large proportion of our population is utterly excluded from our courts. The average annual income of an individual of the working classes is under 30*l.*, while there are very few suits which can be carried on for so small a sum, and a large proportion of contested cases of the simplest description, are not concluded at a less expence than from 70*l.* to 100*l.*: so that if the labourer were able to subsist on air, and willing to sacrifice his whole substance, he would rarely succeed in his demand for justice. The time, too, which it takes to carry on an action in our courts of law (at present we say nothing of Chancery), is seldom less than one whole year, and often extends to four or five, which makes it generally more advisable to submit to wrong than to seek redress, and by offering a premium upon fraud and injustice, renders law the corruptor instead of the help of morals.

The cause of all this delay and expence seems to lie in three peculiarities of our legal system: 1. The confining of the principal courts of justice to the metropolis; 2. The exclusion of evidence, particularly the testimony of the plaintiff and defendant; 3. The artificial complexity of our procedure in other matters, particularly in what relates to the written pleadings.

1. The principal courts being placed in London, and, with a very few exceptions, it being necessary to commence and carry on in them all actions through several of their stages, an injured party who resides at a distance, whether in Cumberland or Cornwall, instead of having a district tribunal to which he may immediately resort, is compelled to go through the following process:—He applies to his attorney in the country: his attorney in the country applies to an attorney in London: the attorney in London obtains the writ which commences the action, and applies to the special pleader, who frames the technical statement which sets forth the cause of action: the pleadings, which are the technical statements of both parties, are, at great expence, sent backwards and forwards several times from the attorney in London to the attorney in the country, and after a lapse of from three to nine months, or more, the attorney in London makes up from these pleadings what is called the record, or authoritative written statement of the plaintiff's claim and defendant's ground of resistance. This record—which is unintelligible to any but lawyers, and to lawyers discloses nothing definite but the naked point in dispute—this record is delivered to the associate of the judge who travels on circuit into the county where the plaintiff lives. At the time of the assizes, the plaintiff, with his country attorney, and sometimes with his London attorney also, repairs to the assize town, and there hires two or more travelling barristers to conduct his cause. But after all this delay, trouble, and expence, it often happens that he cannot obtain a hearing, much less a deliberate hearing. The travelling judge has not usually more than five or six days in the whole year to try all the causes in the county; that is, two or three days at the Spring, and two or three at the Summer assizes. If the plaintiff's cause be one, as it is termed, of little importance—that is, touching a small amount of value, it is hurried over, in order to make way for what are termed more important causes. If it be of the latter class, it is too important, and involves too many details to be properly heard among fifty other causes in the hurry of a three days' assizes, and the parties are often, in spite of the most strenuous resistance, and after incurring the most frightful expence for the attainment of regular justice, foisted off with an arbitrator.

It must not be imagined that this clumsy mode of administering justice, which has existed for so many centuries, is the result of any deliberate plan or superior sagacity in those who set it on foot. Before assessed taxes were invented, before the commerce of the country had made customs and excise a mine of wealth to the government, a main source of the King's revenue was derived from the sale of justice. But as there was a court baron in every manor, from which my lord baron, the hereditary owner of the court, derived also some small income, and hundred courts, and county courts, each productive of fees to a pleasing amount; the King naturally looked on these rival institutions with an evil eye, and under pretence that justice was ill administered in them—which, considering that the presiding baron was self-appointed and irresponsible, is probably true as to the courts baron—contrived that almost every kind of suit should be carried on in his courts at Westminster only. This was effected partly by prohibiting suits of certain descriptions from being entertained at all in the inferior courts, or by giving the metropolitan courts a concurrent jurisdiction, and immediate power of removal to them by either of the parties below. The Crown having thus secured the fees, the next question was, how to satisfy the demand for justice at the least expence. To deny it altogether would be to cut off the fees themselves; to compel parties and witnesses when there was little money and no roads or stage-coaches, to travel from Cumberland to London for the hearing of a cause, would have been in effect to deny it altogether. To save the fees, therefore, and avoid the clamour, as the suitors could not come to the judges in London, the London judges were sent to the suitors: at first, once only in seven years; afterwards, once a year; and finally twice, as at present. This old clock-work of revolving judges has been going so long, that partly out of respect for its antiquity, partly from inability to comprehend its structure, and still more from exaggerated apprehensions as to the inconvenience of change, a large number of well-meaning persons would hear with horror any proposal for taking the machine to pieces, and substituting one better adapted to the wants of modern times; to those, however, who are able to point out the defects of the system, it becomes necessary to assign a more plausible reason for its continuance, and what we usually hear is, that a travelling judge, having no acquaintance or connexions in the county to which he is sent, will not be warped from impartiality by those local biases, and that previous knowledge of the parties, which, as they say, a resident judge could scarcely manage to avoid. It happens, however, that the travelling judge, before he becomes a travelling judge, serves his time as a travelling barrister, and in that capacity forms numerous and intimate connexions, and still more extensive acquaintances in the counties through which it is his custom to pass. When he becomes a judge, old habits and old associations still retain their influence, and he contrives to go, oftener than any other, the circuit he travelled as a barrister. Formerly, he was prohibited from presiding in a county in which he possessed property; but this regulation was found so inconvenient and useless, that it has recently been abandoned. In truth, the best security for the impartiality of a judge does not consist in his ignorance of the parties,—if indeed that be any security at all,—but in the most unbounded publicity that can be given to his proceedings, including of course the vigilant observation of a free press. But even if it were clear, that a resident judge would, in spite of publicity, be guilty of occasional misdecision from motives of partiality, the amount of evil to be incurred in that shape is infinitely less than the absolute and extensive denial of justice, which is unavoidably occasioned by the delay and expense of the present system.

Another reason which is commonly advanced in defence of circuits is, that in the present state of our jurisprudence, particularly of that branch of it which is called oral or unwritten law, it would be impossible to preserve uniformity of decision throughout the kingdom, unless the twelve metropolitan judges, who, to a considerable extent, make the law as occasion calls for it, were themselves to promulge in the provinces the rules upon which they agree to act. To which we would answer, that this desired uniformity might still be preserved, by allowing one stage of appeal to a metropolitan court. Where the parties desired a rehearing upon disputed facts, they might have it, as often as necessary, before the provincial judge or jury, to whom, even as matters now stand, such rehearing would be referred under the name of a new trial. But where they were dissatisfied with the judge's decision in point of law, a statement of the case, and of the point of law in question, might be sent by the post, at little or no expense, direct to the metropolitan court of final appeal, where the only charge to be incurred would be the barrister's fee for argument. But why should the difficulty of the attempt for ever preclude us from having something like a general, and generally intelligible rule of action, in a well-digested code? Why should not the work of consolidation and arrangement, which has been commenced in the instance of the customs, bankrupts, and juries, be carried on through every head of our law. Let a committee of judges determine which of the common law decisions they are willing to abide by, and which to overrule; and let those they are content to abide by be framed into acts of parliament, under appropriate heads and titles. Let new decisions, arising under these heads, be transmitted annually to the legislature, after consultation by the judges; and the rules arising out of them be added to the code under their respective heads. The miserably confused and uncertain state of our jurisprudence compels us to make, even here, these cursory observations, though the subject is one of such difficulty and importance, that we must ere long enter upon it by itself and in detail.

2. But to proceed now, to the second of the three peculiarities in our legal system, which contribute so much to the hindrance of justice; we mean, the exclusion of evidence of various kinds, particularly the testimony of the plaintiff and defendant, to which we shall confine ourselves for the present. This is productive of the most enormous inconvenience, and is attended with no assignable advantage. In nine cases out of ten, if the parties were publicly confronted in the presence of the judge, it would be found, that no matter of fact was in dispute; that nothing could call for consideration but the question of law; and the cause would be ended at once: in all cases, the expense of many witnesses might be saved by admissions and explanations, which could be obtained at once from the parties. The two grounds on which the exclusion is justified, are, the temptation the parties would be under to commit perjury, for the sake of pecuniary gain, and the liability of a jury to be misled by this perjury. Now, exclusion on the ground of the alleged temptation, supposes that men are actuated to falsehood, by no motive but pecuniary interest; that fear and favour, hatred and affection are without influence; that the man who would perjure himself for sixpence, would speak the truth to the ruin of his friend, or kinsman. Unquestionably a man who has an interest in any way, whether in the way of affection, or the way of money, will generally be liable in some degree, to misrepresent; but if the judge and jury can make the necessary allowance for this bias in the case of other motives, upon what ground are we to presume them so foolish, as not to be able to make the same allowance in the case of pecuniary interest? All this while, be it observed, that the testimony of the party injured, is freely admitted in cases of felony, though his property is often restored to him in court, as the immediate result of his testimony: that the life of a prisoner often depends on no other evidence; and that though this evidence is excluded upon civil matters in courts of law, where it might be received in the best shape, subject to the check of publicity and cross-examination, it is constantly admitted in courts of equity, in the most exceptionable shape, viz. in that of depositions drawn up in an artful form by the attorney or counsel, and afterwards sworn to by the party in private, subject to no check from the powerful sanctions of publicity and examination.

3. The artificial complexity of our procedure in other matters, and particularly in the written pleadings, remains to be noticed.

The restricting many portions of this procedure, to certain stated periods called terms, each of them lasting little more than three weeks, and occurring but four times a year, is the obvious cause of much unjustifiable delay; but the most vexatious promotives of delay, vexation and expense, are the written pleadings. Instead of the judge calling the parties before him, ascertaining from each of them, what is the ground of complaint and what the answer, and reducing this to writing himself as in the case of a trial for felony, the parties are obliged before trial to make a statement in a technical form, upon the conformity of which to certain scientific rules, the event of the cause often turns altogether independently of its merits. Further, as it is not allowed to give in evidence any thing at variance with, or not suggested by this technical statement, and as it cannot be ascertained with certainty before-hand, what the witnesses will say, the parties are often obliged to make different statements, sometimes to the number of 50 or more, and seldom fewer than ten, in order that one of these may have a chance of agreeing with the evidence to be adduced. Copies of these multiplied writings are then to be made in great number, for judges, counsel, &c. The only pretence assigned for the waste of time and money occasioned by this useless repetition, is, to prevent either of the parties being taken by surprise at the trial, by the allegations of the other; but these pleadings are so far from giving the slightest information as to the nature of the case to be brought forward, that it has for years been the established practice for the judges to compel the plaintiff, in addition to his technical statement termed the declaration, to give in a bill of particulars, which is nothing more than a brief and ordinary statement of what he requires at the hand of the defendant, such as any person is competent to draw up, and to which he is confined at the trial, so that the scientific and interminable declaration becomes entirely useless. So, with regard to the defendant; although in one class of actions, he is still obliged to frame what are termed his special pleas,—an infinite number of different statements of his grounds of defence, drawn up in a minute conformity with certain ancient rules,—yet in another, and by far more extensive class, he is allowed, in what is called a general issue, simply to deny the truth of the plaintiff's charge, and under this denial, without further notice to the plaintiff, to give in evidence every possible variety of defence. Indeed we have the strongest legislative recognition of the inutility and mischievousness of special pleading; for almost every act which prescribes rules for regulating procedure in the affairs of chartered companies, public commissioners, actions against magistrates, and the like—expressly enables defendants in such cases, to give in evidence every kind of defence under the general issue; that is, a general denial of any charge made against them, without the least intimation to the other party of the real ground of defence.

The evil occasioned by the denial of justice arising out of the three causes we have just explained, has been so intolerable, that from time to time, various palliatives have been applied by the legislature; the chief of these, are, what are termed Courts of Conscience, which have been established in most of our large towns, for the recovery of debts to the amount of forty shillings, and in some instances, five pounds. These courts are presided over by judges resident within the district, by whom the parties litigant are at once examined touching the matter in dispute, without incurring the expense of making statements in the way of written pleadings. The great defect of these courts has been the absence of responsibility, and the want of appropriate aptitude in the persons appointed to preside over them. The judges of these Courts of Conscience are generally a number of unpaid commissioners, selected from the tradesmen in the neighbourhood; wholly ignorant of law, and often conducting their proceedings with closed doors. Considering the numbers among whom it is divided, the responsibility attaching to any one of these judges, is reduced almost to nothing; for men, like hounds, will do many things in packs, which they would be afraid to venture on singly.—The responsibility, such as it is, is not assisted by any fear of publicity, and let the worst happen, and misconduct be brought to light, the excuse is always ready; “These functionaries do their work for nothing; we must not, therefore, be severe, to mark what is amiss in them.”

Notwithstanding these objections, Courts of Conscience have been found upon the whole, so much less bad than our ordinary courts, that there has been a constant demand for their extension. We have seen that at present they are confined to our large towns, and usually to cases of debt not exceeding forty shillings. Lord Althorp, therefore, with the most praise-worthy industry and benevolence, has for many years been labouring to establish for the people at large, courts which should combine all the advantages of Courts of Conscience, without their defects, which should proceed in the same natural and summary way, but be presided over by judges competent to the discharge of their duties.

His first plan was, that there should be a district judge for every two or three counties; that he should hold jury courts in every considerable town, once a quarter at least, and have jurisdiction over cases of debt to the amount of ten pounds; that the pleadings should be confined to certain brief printed forms, with blanks to be filled up as the case required; that the fees and costs should not exceed 17 or 18 shillings; a party who chooses to employ counsel or attorney, not being allowed to recover the expense from his adversary. The judges were to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenants of counties.—This bill was thrown out, and the failure of it is not to be regretted, when we consider that the appointment of judges in such bands must have degenerated into a mere job. The Lord Lieutenant being subject to no responsibility or check, would necessarily, in the greater number of instances, have appointed his relation or friend, instead of the person most competent to discharge the duty.

In the ensuing Session, Lord Althorp proposed to vest the appointment in the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Immediately the Whigs set up a loud outcry about the influence of the Crown; and partly by this means, partly because it afforded no compensation to certain individuals who were likely to be affected by its operation, the bill was thrown out. This was a serious loss to the public, for though it were to be wished that the new jurisdiction should have permitted one cheap stage of appeal, such as we have above proposed, should have embraced other grounds of action besides debt, and debts to a greater if not to any amount; though it were to be wished that the fees should have been fewer, and the officers have been paid by salaries,—yet, the measure as it stood, would have conferred a great benefit on the country. As to the increased influence of the Crown, admitting it to be an objection, as far as it goes, it is far from being preponderant; since the evil of the influence is limited to the circle of the bar, already so much within the sphere of its dominion; whereas the evil occasioned by the want of justice is almost unlimited: besides, unless our institutions were to undergo an entire change, it is not easy to see in whom the appointments could be vested with less likelihood of abuse, than in the Ministers of the Crown, towards whose conduct the public attention is constantly directed, and who, therefore, are to some extent responsible for a bad appointment.

In the last Session, considerable provision was made in the way of compensation, and in order to conciliate the Whigs, the plan of having twenty or more dis-strict judges was abandoned. Instead of this, it was proposed that the judges of the Insolvent Debtors' court, should go circuits, and hold their courts two or three times a-year. This would have placed matters on as bad a footing as in the courts of Westminster Hall. It is not to be regretted, therefore, that the measure in this shape was rejected by the House of Lords; though without discussion, and upon a very different ground; namely, the alleged inadequacy of the compensation.

It is to be hoped that Lord Althorp will not relax in his praise-worthy endeavours, and that he will be assisted in it by the Ministers of the Crown; at least if he drop his plan of circuits, and give the people tribunals to which they may have constant access. We regret that it is not at present in our power to enter more extensively into this important topic, but we shall immediately begin the undertaking. All who have had the courage to look the evil in the face, must have perceived that our whole judicial establishment requires remodelling, to adapt it to the exigencies of the present age; but to point out in detail how this should be effected, will be a task of no ordinary difficulty. Meanwhile, the institution of county courts with a limited jurisdiction, would afford a considerable palliative for the evils occasioned by the old system, and to this extent there are hopes that reform may prevail. It is for this reason, we have felt it incumbent on us to explain as briefly and familiarly as we could, the existing state of things, and the nature of the attempt that has been made by Lord Althorp.

If no reasons had been adduced in favour of the measure, the arguments advanced by the lawyers in the course of the debates, would prove it to be unobjectionable. When a veteran advocate like Mr. Scarlett, thoroughly versed in every branch of our law, and conversant with the mode of its administration, is reduced, in lieu of assigning specific objections, to call the measure a "violent innovation*," we may be satisfied that he has only recourse to such vulgar fallacies, because he has nothing else to urge. If he could point out any mischief likely to ensue, or could prove that no benefit could be produced, by putting justice within reach of the poor, he would never content himself with confusing the uninitiated, or scaring old women with the bugbear "innovation;" and if he, of all men the most competent, to make the worse appear the better cause—has no more to advance, we may rest assured, that the remainder of his fraternity could add nothing to the arguments of their learned leader.

Court of Chancery.

As the commissioners appointed to explore the mazes of Chancery have not yet made their report, we shall defer till the next session that exhaustive examination of the subject which its difficulty and importance demands. In the meantime, we cannot avoid expressing our regret at the manner in which it has been handled in parliament.

The prevailing cause of the delay and expense of equity proceedings, is the circumstance of there being but three or four equity courts,—and those all placed in the metropolis,—to transact the business of the whole population of England. In our observations on the County Courts' bill, we have explained the impossibility of administering justice cheaply and expeditiously without bringing the parties litigant at once into the presence of the judge: but for three or four judges to examine the parties in every cause arising over such an extent of country, would be impossible; this, therefore, renders necessary, that system of written pleadings, affidavit, and interrogatories, which are of themselves, far too costly for the pocket of an ordinary suitor. The evil, indeed, can never be cured but by a total change of system, and the establishment of district as well as metropolitan courts: but it is scarcely possible to establish district courts with any good effect, until our laws shall have been remodelled into an accessible and intelligible code; and the difficulty and extent of this undertaking, is such as to render it in the eyes of many persons almost hopeless. The outcry, which has now been made, will probably occasion some trifling curtailment of the length of chancery proceedings, some slight acceleration of the various stages of process, and the abolition of some of the most outrageous abuses, such as the charging for three attendances before the master, and giving only one. This may diminish the whole load of evil in the proportion of five out of a hundred; a slow chancellor may die, and a quick one succeed him. This may diminish it five more; but no human powers could administer justice to a whole kingdom under such institutions as those which exist at present, nor under such institutions materially alleviate the mass of misery occasioned either by the denial of justice, or the destruction of the suitors' property. It is to this point, and to this exclusively, that we would direct the public attention. Let authentic information in every possible shape be obtained, as to the duration, expense, and mode of proceeding in chancery suits in general; let it be seen, whether it be possible to avoid delay and expense, without bringing the parties litigant at once into the presence of the judge; whether it be possible to bring them into the presence of the judge without having district tribunals; and whether it would be expedient to establish district tribunals without first compiling a code of laws for their uniform guidance. Admitting all that has been insinuated, rather than proved against the present chancellor, to be true,—admitting that he doubts more and decides less than any of his predecessors,—admitting that he aggravates all the evils of the court over which he presides,—for that very reason we would wish him to preside there a little longer, not for the benefit of the suitors, but of the community at large. Such a judge, if the insinuations against him be true, is of infinite service in drawing general attention to the inseparable vices of the system. With a view, therefore, to reforming the Court of Chancery, we cannot perceive any advantage to be gained by attacking the Chancellor, and we are sure that such a course is attended with many disadvantages. It diverts the public attention from the great defects of the system, to a mere squabble about the merits or demerits of an individual, and it arms against the cause of improvement, the numerous and powerful friends of the Chancellor, including the ministry for the time being.

If the blame lay mainly with the Chancellor, he ought to have been impeached for incapacity. For though the impeachment of a minister be a mere sound, and as our system is constituted at present, must terminate in his acquittal, or in an act of indemnity, it has at least the advantage of making the public acquainted with the extent of his delinquency; but the alleged misconduct of the Chancellor, and the imperfections of establishment over which he presides, ought never to have been joined together as the subject of the same investigation.

We are satisfied, that they who have called for and promoted the investigation, have acted with the best intentions; but, with a view to any effective alteration or improvement, we fear they have greatly erred in judgment. In addition to this, they have not exhibited such a knowledge of the subject in hand, either in a general view, or in its actual details, as is at all calculated to inspire the confidence of the public. Mr. Williams, the mover, has indeed evinced an ignorance of the nature of decisions and proceedings in equity, which would surprise us even in a student who had just read his Blackstone for the first time. Upon no better authority than an old joke of Selden's about the consciences of various Chancellors varying as the lengths of their respective feet, he gravely asserts that the decisions in chancery are guided by no rule or precedent, but depend altogether upon the discretion or caprice of the moment. But the decisions in chancery are just as much confined and regulated by precedent, as the decisions in the Court of King's Bench. In both tribunals, the judges, to a great extent, have no other rule or guide, than reports of decisions of their predecessors in cases analogous or exactly similar. The principles contained in these reports, not having been sanctioned by the fiat of the legislature, the courts, it is true, are but imperfectly bound by them, and frequently overrule or confirm them, as the feeling of the moment prompts; but they are at least as much bound in courts of equity as in courts of law. Else, what mean the hundreds of volumes of reports of chancery cases; why do judges in equity courts repeatedly declare their desire to decide one in one way upon a given occasion, and the necessity imposed on them to decide in another by reason of the principles laid down in the reported decisions of their predecessors?

A moment's consideration of these circumstances might have satisfied Mr. Williams, that equity does proceed by certain rules, and that these rules are, in effect, no other than rules of law applied to a particular class of subjects. But he asserts, that the jurisdiction of Chancery is a usurpation on the common law, and that it is altogether unconstitutional, that is, we presume, (for we can affix no decisive meaning to the word), something of which he disapproves—something pernicious—something which may beneficially be dispensed with. With regard to the alleged usurpation, we will not so trifle with the time and patience of our readers as to enter into a disquisition about the origin of a court which has been recognised by the legislature for several centuries as the highest tribunal of the kingdom. If the Court of Chancery be a usurpation, so is the House of Commons, so the Court of King's Bench; and as for the Court of Common Pleas, the whole of its proceedings are a mere nullity. Whether or not we could dispense with such a jurisdiction as that which is now exercised by Chancery, let Mr. Williams say, when he has considered what the common law can do in the thousand cases which are unprovided with any evidence but that of the parties litigant, whose testimony is so carefully excluded from our courts of law; what those courts could do in matters of trust, which they do not even recognise; what they could do for the protection of married women, whose separate interest they will not endure to hear of; what, in cases where a specific performance of a contract is the one thing necessary to justice, and where damages can afford no adequate compensation. Mr. Williams will scarcely be prepared to contend, that all jurisdiction over subjects of this kind ought to be abolished, and in the present state of our jurisprudence he would be the last to propose to confer it on the courts of common law. Indeed, without altering the whole frame of our jurisprudence, it is not easy to perceive how those courts could exercise such a jurisdiction. Upon the possibility or expediency of such an alteration this is not the place to enlarge, but we cannot forbear expressing an opinion, that under an improved judicial system, every court ought to have cognizance over every kind of cause, and that the distribution of the tribunals should be purely local, without any metaphysical division of jurisdictions. This is a topic on which Mr. Williams has evidently thought very little, or thought to very little purpose; for he is, indeed, mistaken if he imagines that the institution of juries is alone able to supply every defect in the administration of justice. We had hoped, however, that he would at least have been competent to have collected and brought forward the details of the present state of Chancery procedure; but in this point he has failed as signally as on every other. There is not a town or hamlet, there is scarcely a family possessed of any property, that is not more or less involved in the vortex of this dreadful tribunal: day after day multiplies the number of victims; and a large return might annually be made of those who actually die of protracted hope, disappointment, and even starvation, which might have been prevented by the acquisition of property withheld from them by the ruinous delays of the court: thousands of cases might be brought forward which have lasted from ten to twenty years, and upon each of which from ten to twenty thousand pounds has been expended. The difficulty among so many victims is not which to select, but which to put aside for the present; and yet Mr. Williams, with such a mass of undeniable suffering to choose from, brings forward in his last speech, five cases, none of which are aggravated, and nearly the whole of which admit of explanation and answer, if not of complete exculpation. This answer and explanation were given to a certain extent by the Solicitor General, who thus, upon an occasion when even he might have been reduced to silence, was enabled, for the only time in the history of Parliament, to make a plausible statement in vindication of the proceedings in Chancery. However excellent Mr. Williams's intentions may be, he is manifestly incompetent to the task he has undertaken. At present he has done harm rather than good by exposing himself to an inexcusable defeat; and we cannot help praying that the business may fall into abler hands.

Consolidation of the Jury Laws.

THE statutes enacted in our Parliaments, and the decisions reported in our courts of law, are daily and hourly multiplying to such a degree, that the necessity of framing them all into a well digested code is every where sensibly felt. To buy these new laws as they come forth year by year is a matter of difficulty even to men of moderate fortune; to read them all, impossible. We reprobate the tyrant of old, who, with a view to entrap his subjects into offences, wrote his laws in so small a character, and hung the tables up so high, that it was difficult to read them accurately: our courts always act on the maxim "ignorantia legis neminem excusat;" and yet we forget, that a large portion of our own jurisprudence—the oral or unwritten law which is said to reside in the breast of the judges—is absolutely inscrutable by any one; and that the rest of it is, from its bulk and confusedness, inaccessible and unintelligible to ordinary readers. But it is not only for the purpose of affording the community at large some chance of learning the rules of action by which they ought to regulate their lives, that a code has become so absolutely necessary; it is also indispensable to the due administration of justice. In a former article, on the County Courts' Bill, we have shown that, in the present state of our judicial establishment and modes of procedure, by far the larger proportion of the people are absolutely excluded from our courts of justice, and that the inconvenience could not be effectually remedied without a different organization of the system, and the establishment of local tribunals. But the framing of a code seems to be almost an indispensable preliminary to any such plan of improvement: for though twelve judges, living together in the metropolis, and proceeding periodically thence to their respective circuits, preserve something like an appearance of uniformity of decision, even in the present state of our jurisprudence, it would be difficult, if not impossible, that this should be accomplished by local judges, who would have no intercourse with each other. We hail, therefore, with satisfaction, any approach towards the formation of a code, although, in the present state of opinion among our lawyers, and the ignorance of the subject which unavoidably prevails among the rest of the community, we have little hopes of seeing any thing like a systematic body of laws, adapted to the wants of the public. Without discarding the relics of feudal institutions, the barbarous nomenclature and frivolous distinctions of the middle ages, we can make but slight approaches towards a generally useful and intelligible manual of jurisprudence.

Something, however, has been gained, if, notwithstanding the prevailing habit of indiscriminately eulogizing existing institutions, a minister of the Crown admits that all is not right, and makes the first approaches to a better state of things. It is something, to collect and arrange the scattered members of our confused statute book, and to place in available order those materials for a code which we possess in greater abundance than any other nation. By this commencement alone, Mr. Peel has secured to himself, if we mistake not, a more certain and durable celebrity than the "heaven-born minister" with all his wars and all his prodigality.

The commencement which has so successfully been made in consolidating the statutes relating to customs, juries, and bankrupts, might be speedily carried on through all the various heads under which our acts of parliament may be classed, and carried on with the consent and approbation even of those who would view with horror any attempt to reconstruct the great edifice of law. Commissioners might be appointed, one or more to each of the divisions which our laws at present recognize, who might simultaneously collect, arrange, and compress all that is to be found within their respective departments. From the statute they might proceed to the common law, and deal in the same way with all those decisions which have established principles now recognized by our courts. These might be amalgamated with the new statutes, and rest for the future on the firm basis of legislative enactment, instead of remaining in the shape of mere opinions, which every judge in succession is at liberty to abide by or overrule, as may suit the interest or inclination of the moment. To the statute book thus compressed and arranged, a standing commission might every year add, in their proper place, such new decisions as involved any principle of general importance.

What has been accomplished by the consolidation of the statutes concerning juries alone, may be seen in Mr. Peel's speech*.

—Enactments scattered through nearly 400 acts of parliament have been brought together and arranged in one statute: The burthen of serving the office of juror has been more extensively and more equally distributed: and, with a view to impartiality, the mode of nominating special jurors has been assimilated to that by which common jurors have always been appointed—that is, the numbers of any given special jury are to be taken by chance out of the whole number of persons liable to be called on for the occasion in question. When it is considered that the main use of a jury is to operate as a check upon the judge, it will scarcely be believed a few years hence, that in the only class of cases in which the integrity of the judges could be open to suspicion, namely, the trials of political offenders—the Court of King's Bench established and upheld the practice of selecting the jurors by an officer appointed by the court.—We say established, because till within a few years, Mr. Lushington, the officer of the court whose business it was to attend to the nomination of juries in such cases, had been by his own admission in the habit of nominating them upon a principle of chance; viz. by sticking his pen at random into the leaves of a book containing the jurors' names, and taking the juror whose name was nearest the point of the pen. This mode, which had long been in use, and which, as we have said, he had himself practised for many years in the nomination of special jurors for civil cases, he chose to depart from in a series of political trials for libel, which commenced about the year 1817, and without assigning any other reason for discontinuing the old practice, than that it occasioned him trouble, he proceeded in lieu thereof to select the jury arbitrarily, without assigning any reason for adopting one man or rejecting another.—His conduct being complained of, the Court of King's Bench decided twice, (Rex v. Wooler, 1 Barnewall and Alderson's reports 193; and Rex v. Edmonds, 4th vol. of the same reports 484) that the officer of the court had a right to select, and that it would be contrary to all precedent and example if he should take the names by some mode of chance!—

Far be it from us to say that the officer did or would abuse this power; but we assert that under these decisions he had the power of packing, and to this power we object, as subversive of the very end of juries. To what an extent a corrupt officer might have abused this power may be conceived, when it is stated in the report of a committee appointed by the common council of London to inquire into this matter, that a considerable proportion of the special jurors who usually served, were needy persons, whose livelihood depended upon the number of causes they could be appointed to try. Let them but dare to give one verdict against the crown, it is obvious they could never be appointed again by an officer, who could not be convicted of corruption as he never assigned reasons for adoption or exclusion. It is no slight proof of the magnanimity and integrity of Mr. Peel, that he has renounced this pernicious power of packing, so hardly and successfully established for the government, by the Court of King's Bench; and now that we have been relieved from the usurpation, it is difficult to avoid smiling at the difference between legislative and judicial wisdom. In Rex v. Dolby (2 Barnewall and Cresswell's Reports, III.) Abbott, C. J. says, "Our common law acknowledges no such absurdity as taking by chance and hazard the persons who are to discharge the important duties of jurymen." The learned Chief Justice seems to have forgotten that common jurors have never been taken in any other way, and as they have to determine an infinitely greater number of causes than special jurors, their functions must, in any view which comprehends the greatest happiness of the greatest number, be the more important of the two. The possibility of getting upon the jury one or two persons who might be strong partisans on either side, is a thing unavoidable under any impartial plan, which can be no other than some modification of a system of chance. His lordship also forgot, that with regard to special jurors at least, the law had provided for this inconvenience, and had excluded the possibility of any absurdity, by allowing each party to strike out twelve of the forty-eight first appointed; so that the interference of the officer of the court was as unnecessary as it was open to abuse.

However, be this as it may, that which it suited the views of the King's Bench to brand as an absurdity in 1823, the Secretary of State for the Home Department makes the object of a special and deliberate enactment in 1825.

We shall conclude our very summary observations with a few remarks on the manner in which the present act has been framed. It would perhaps be impossible to devise a style less adapted to the purpose of legislative precision, than that of English acts of parliament. The framers of them seem not to have known enough of language or logic to perceive that a general term renders unnecessary the employment of any particular terms included in its meaning; and instead of securing themselves by a careful selection of generals, have endeavoured to attain something like certainty, by a profuse mention of particulars. This not only adds enormously to the length of the statute book, but occasions the very uncertainty it was proposed to avoid; inasmuch as no human memory can be relied on to exhaust all particulars, and where many are specified, the omission of some must always be deemed intentional. The framer of the present act, being a lawyer, has not ventured entirely to depart from the old model, in this particular; probably, not wishing to incur the ill opinion of the judges before whom he practises: but he has to a considerable degree curtailed the pleonasm of his predecessors. In another respect, however, he has closely followed their ill example, and has made his statute, like all others, one long sentence from beginning to end. Unless obscurity and confusion be the object in view, it is impossible to assign any good reason why every statute should not be split into numbered and titled divisions and subdivisions; as in the present case, 1. Jurors, who may be, and who not.—2. How, and when placed upon the list. 3. How chosen for trials. 4. How paid; and so on. Even the conveyancers, the most inveterate adherents to ancient forms, have adopted the practice of dividing long deeds of certain descriptions, into numbered articles. It is to be hoped, the legislature will at length follow the example, and by so easy an alteration, give us some little assistance towards comprehending and referring to the increasing loads of statutory law.

Bills to prevent Cruelty to Animals.

THIS is a subject on which it is of some importance that men's minds should be settled. Probably, for some time to come, it will continue to be brought, at different intervals, before the legislature and the public. It is desirable that the cases which differ essentially from each other, (and it includes several such cases), should be discriminated; that the true principles of legislation should be ascertained; and that the public feeling should be directed into the proper channel. Mr. Martin is actuated, we do not doubt, by benevolent motives; but nothing is so mischievous as blind benevolence: cruelty, the most dreadful and extensive, often has its source in humanity; and even ambition and tyranny are scarcely more injurious to society than active philanthropy without wisdom. Whenever, therefore, the adoption of any thing affecting the condition of a large number of sentient beings is proposed, as a matter of benevolence, it is necessary that its nature and tendency should be investigated with peculiar care. There are persons whose sanction is sure to be obtained to almost any object, by the mere name of benevolence. Because a measure is projected from motives of humanity, they consider it unnecessary to examine into its real and practical operation, and seem to apprehend that the best proof which they can give of the kindness of their feelings, is to neglect the exercise of their judgment. It would be easy to shew the evils which result from this ill-regulated impulse, by a reference to several of our popular institutions, the tendency of which to effect good is now pretty generally doubted, but which are still allowed to continue in operation, and which were once the subjects of great and almost universal praise. There are few topics more obnoxious to this misleading influence, than that which we are about to examine; and it is for this reason that we propose to investigate it with some strictness. In pursuing the inquiry, we shall first consider certain principles which we deem fundamental; we shall next show that these principles afford a guide for the course which ought to be pursued by the legislator; we shall then try, by the standard formed by these principles, the various measures which have been proposed; and, lastly, we shall examine, by the same test, what has been advanced on the subject in parliament.

In the first place, it will be conceded that man has, to an unlimited extent, the power of appropriating the brute creation to his service, and that, to a great extent, it is expedient (we may say necessary) that this power should be exercised to the destruction of animal life.

The truth is, that the destruction is necessary to the preservation of animal life. This is a general law; and in the necessity which is imposed upon man by the very constitution of his nature, of deprising other animals of life in order to preserve his own, he differs in no respect from the animals on which he feeds. From man downwards to the very bottom of the scale of being, one class is made to furnish food to another; that to a third; the third to a fourth, and so on; and unless the second destroy the third, and the third the fourth, all must perish. Those animals which appear to live on vegetable matter, afford no real exception to this rule: for they destroy myriads of small, whereas the former destroy a few large animals.

It will not, perhaps, be so readily conceded, but it is a point equally indisputable, that brutes have no rights. A right is, in effect, a power conferred on an individual, or individuals, by the body politic in which they live: it implies a corresponding obligation on the part of some other individual, or individuals, to render a service, or abstain from doing an injury, to the individual who possesses the right; and, we may add, will and power on the part of the body politic to enforce the observance of the obligation.

Now, as we set out by shewing that man has an unlimited power over the inferior animals, and that it is absolutely necessary that he should, to a considerable extent, exercise this power to their destruction, it would be as absurd to say that he is under any obligation to render service, or abstain from doing injury to a brute, as it would be augury to confer a right which the brute has no means of enforcing.

That man often finds it to his own advantage to render service or abstain from doing injury to brutes, is another thing; and this brings us at once to the principle which ought to guide the legislator in these matters, viz. the advantage which man may derive from his interference, or the disadvantage he may suffer from non-interference. That there are instances in which it is expedient, for the sake of man himself, that the legislator should restrain and modify the exercise of many of the powers which man originally possesses, is perfectly clear; but it is now admitted as an equally clear principle of legislation, that he ought not to interfere with the exercise of such powers unless he can shew the interference to be productive of advantage either to the individual or to society at large.

Here, and here only, the legislator is on solid ground: yet this principle has not hitherto been recognized; and it is singular that every attempt at legislation on this subject which has hitherto been made, has proceeded on the very opposite assumption. Every positive enactment, every one of Mr. Martin's bills; almost every thing which has been said upon the subject in parliament, proceeds upon the principle that the legislator is quite within his province, and is performing a function which strictly belongs to him, when he legislates for the protection of brute animals, and when he contemplates their good alone. We maintain that all legislation on this principle is absurd and vicious; that the constitution, or the protection of the rights of human beings, ought to be the sole object of human legislation; that no reason can be assigned for the interference of the legislator in the protection of animals, unless their protection be connected, either directly or remotely, with some advantage to man; and that, therefore, that advantage constitutes the real and the only ground for the legislator's interposition.

In the exercise of his power over the brute creation, do, then, any cases occur in which a man may so abuse that power as to injure the community of human beings?—is the abuse of such a nature that the legislator can check it?—and, lastly, is his interposition the best remedy for the evil? Before he can interfere, an answer in the affirmative must be given to each of these questions.

Let us make the application of these principles to the various cases in which the interposition of the legislator, for the protection of animals, has been deemed proper: as we have already said, they will serve as a test to ascertain whether any such cases really exist; and if so, they will enable us to discriminate them in a satisfactory manner.

Now all the cases in which the philanthropist can wish to interfere for the protection of animals, or in which it can possibly be supposed that the legislature ought to do so, may be arranged under four classes:—1. Cases in which animals are made to suffer, or are deprived of life, in order to furnish food or raiment to man.—2. Cases in which animals are made to suffer, or are deprived of life, in order to afford amusement to man.—3. Cases in which animals are made to suffer, or are deprived of life from wantonness, or from the unrestrained indulgence of passion.—

4. Cases in which animals are made to suffer, or are deprived of life, for the advancement of science.

1. With reference to the first class of cases, those in which animals are made to suffer, or are deprived of life, in order to furnish food or raiment to man, it is singular, that no complaint is ever heard of the extent to which suffering and death are inflicted, although were all the suffering and death, resulting from all the other causes, added together, and multiplied a thousand-fold, they would not amount to a tithe of that which arises from this single cause. It is computed, that for the supply of animal food for the city of London alone, there are annually slaughtered—of bullocks, 110,000; of sheep, 770,000; of lambs, 250,000; of calves, 250,000; of pigs, 200,000: independently of game of all descriptions, of birds of all kinds, and of fish. What then must be the amount of animals slaughtered for all the great cities of England, for all its towns and villages, for all the great cities, towns, and villages of all the nations of Europe; for all the cities, towns, and villages of the globe? Let it be considered, that this vast destruction of animal life, is a thing of as steady and regular occurrence as the succession of day to night; that in whatever other respects the habits of the various people of the earth may change, they never change in this; that as surely as the sun arises, and awakens the nations to the ordinary occupations of life, it summons these myriads of animals to suffer and to die. Yet of this amount of suffering and death, it never enters into the mind of man to complain. Since it is the means of affording subsistence to human beings, the utility—the absolute necessity of it is so apparent, that all men acquiesce in it, as the result of a general law which nature herself has ordained. Here then is a universal recognition of the power of man in this respect, and of the necessity of exercising it.

In furnishing the supply of food, there may indeed be an objection, and a valid objection, to some particular modes in which animals are secured, or in which, after having been secured, they are put to death. There are cases in which the suffering to the animal is certain, and the good to man uncertain and trivial. Such, for example, is the manner in which some animals are treated while yet living, in order to render them more delicate, or more agreeable to the palate. Is it justifiable to inflict suffering, perhaps severe and long continued, with this view? It is probable that every well-constituted and enlightened mind will decide in the negative, and will particularly lament the infliction of all pain beyond the measure necessary for human subsistence. But how is the evil to be corrected? According to the principles which have been laid down, the legislator ought not to interfere, unless it is plain that human beings are injured, and that his interference is necessary to put a stop to the evil. It will not be easy to shew that any human beings are injured, either directly or remotely, by the practices here alluded to. They can only be injured remotely, namely, by the generation of a cruel disposition in those who are in the habit of inflicting this suffering. Could it be shown that these practices so corrupt the dispositions of such persons, as to render them bad members of society, that would be a good reason (as we shall show immediately) for the interference of the legislature: but the fisherman who is in the daily habit of pegging lobsters, does not manifest a more ferocious disposition than the butcher who is in the daily habit of cutting the throat of sheep; and if no other evil result to man can be suggested, that is a sufficient reason why the legislator should no more interfere with the fisherman than with the butcher. It follows that if the former inflict more suffering than is necessary, and the latter inflict only suffering which is necessary, the correction of the excess must be found elsewhere. It may be found—it can be found, only in education, and the consequent creation of a greater degree of reflection and susceptibility in the public mind. This is the only question which can possibly arise in reference to the first class of cases; and it is at once decided by applying to it the principle which has been stated.

2. The second class of cases to be considered, is that in which animals are made to suffer, or are deprived of life, for the purpose of affording amusement. Amusement is a good, not indeed so indispensable as nourishment, but it is nevertheless a good. Taking the good, therefore, at a certain amount, before the legislator restrains the power of man to procure this good, he ought to shew that the amusement is attended with more than a corresponding amount of evil.

The evil to be apprehended to man in amusements derived from the suffering of brutes, is the production of an indifference to suffering in general, and of a consequent brutal and ferocious disposition, which may ultimately turn out the bane of society.

The amusements in question are chiefly of two kinds; field sports, such as hunting, shooting, fishing, &c.; and combats of animals, such as bull fights, bull and bear-baiting, cock-fighting, &c.

In field sports the attention of the sportsman is unquestionably drawn off in a great degree from the suffering of the animal by the ardour of pursuit, and the pleasures arising from the exercise of skill. It is difficult, however, to conceive how an educated person can avoid reflecting on the torments he occasions, and if he has reflected, it is still more difficult to conceive that his heart should not be hardened by persisting in the practice. Shooting is the least cruel of these kind of sports, and yet "whatever pleasure a man may take in the exercise, and the skill of this kind of sport, one would think he could feel no very enviable sensations every time he takes up his prey struggling in the agonies of death. His employment is then, if he has any humanity, to beat its head against the end of his gun, to release it from its torture: if he be indifferent upon that subject, he throws the agonizing creature into his net, there to welter in its blood, and to beat its broken wings against some former martyr of his sports, who lies there in the convulsions of death. These barbarities, however, are innocent, when compared with the refinements of cruelty which are practised in hunting. It is hardly possible to conceive any greater agony than that which is endured by a hare during a long chase. Flying, for hours together, before a whole multitude of its destroyers, having its ears pierced, and its heart distracted with the war-whoop of these savage pursuers, with a certainty that a painful death awaits it; exhausted with fatigue; incapable of proceeding, yet not daring to stop; convulsed in every fibre, and sinking under the terror of instant destruction, it is at length seized by its pursuers with savage exultation*."

Another point ought also to be considered, before we can decide whether in the long run field sports are to be esteemed beneficial or pernicious to man. These sports avowedly engross, both in and out of the House, a great deal of the time and attention of a large majority of our legislators: but it may perhaps be questioned, whether a diligent pursuit of the fox, or a nice discrimination in pointers, is likely to assist a man towards acquiring that extensive knowledge, and dexterous application of principle, without which a legislator may do more harm than good. Pope, indeed, has described one statesman,

Mad at a fox-chase, wise at a debate:"—

In general, however, it may be presumed, that an interest in trifles cannot but unfit the mind for serious exertion or acquirement, and it may be more than suspected that a devotion to field sports is the cause of much ignorant and mischievous legislation.

How far these sports can be enjoyed, or will be considered worth having, without the intervention of game laws, is a problem yet to be solved. If it should turn out that game laws are essential to the amusement, considering the amount of suffering, crime, and moral depravation occasioned by those laws, it may safely be pronounced that the amusement is purchased at a greater expence of human misery, than any amusement that the great have ever pursued, war not excepted.

But to whatever opinion we may come with regard to the effect of field sports upon the condition of man, there can be no doubt upon those cases, in which the sport itself, from its very nature, has a direct tendency to injure the dispositions of the spectators. That it is possible for such an exhibition as would commonly be termed a sport, to have such a tendency, is indisputable. It is certain, that whenever the spectacle consists in the mere exhibition of ferocious courage, it will have a pernicious effect on the human mind. The exhibition of two savage animals, which are excited to attack each other with the greatest fury until one or both perish, in consequence of lacerating and tearing each other to pieces; or the exhibition of several animals, which are incited to fall upon a single animal, in its own nature peaceful, until they worry it into uncontrollable rage, cannot be witnessed by any human being without injury. No man, whose disposition has not been previously corrupted, can be present at such an exhibition for the first time without horror; and if he subsequently bring himself to view it without disgust, and even with interest, it is only by achieving a conquest over one of the most important and useful feelings of the human heart. Sympathy with suffering, whether witnessed in a brute animal, or in one of his own species, is the involuntary impulse of every uncorrupted human being in society: an impulse tending first to the security of other beings, and ultimately to his own; and which cannot be destroyed without rendering him in the highest degree degraded and dangerous. But all such exhibitions have a powerful and direct tendency to destroy sympathy with suffering: they produce with astonishing rapidity, and to a most alarming extent, hardness of heart. There never was a human being who witnessed them often, and with pleasure, who did not exemplify, in every situation in which he could exemplify it, cruelty of disposition. But a cruel disposition is blind: it makes no discrimination in its objects: its first victims may be animals, its ultimate victims are sure to be men.

In the debate on the second reading of Mr. Martin's bill, on Friday, March 11, Mr. G. Lamb gives an account, from Evelyn, of a bull-bait which took place in the time of Charles the Second. Evelyn states, that one of the dogs was thrown so high that he fell into the lap of a lady of rank in the second gallery. Two dogs were killed. The sport ended with the ape on horseback, "and I retired," continues Evelyn, "wearied with the filthy scene, which I had not witnessed for many years." Mr. Lamb then read an account of an exhibition of the same kind which took place in 1702, in the reign of Queen Anne. He states that he found the bill amongst the papers of the Vice Chamberlain of that day, who was one of the prime beaux of the court. The bill, which was headed with the Queen's arms, ran thus:—

"Anna, Regina. At the Bear, in Hockley-in-the-Hole, near Clerkenwell Green. This is to give notice to all gentlemen, gamsters, and others, that on the 17th of April, a bald-faced dog of Middlesex, will be matched against a dog of Cow-cross. A guinea each dog. He that shows the fullest and finest game, and comes most clean to hand, wins all. And a great mad bull will be turned loose in the yard, with fire works all over him, and two or three cats tied to his tail. Also other varieties. A bull-baiting and a bear-baiting. Beginning at two o'clock in the afternoon. Regina vivat."

Mr. Martin, on Thursday, Feb. 24, in moving for leave to bring in a bill, to prevent bear-baiting and other cruel practices, read an affiche, which he stated had been placarded throughout the town, and which was as follows:

"By the express invitation of several noble men and gentlemen of distinction.—Billy, the phenomenon of the canine race, and superior vermin killer of his day, having killed nearly 4,000 rats in about seven hours, will once more go through his wonderful career of destroying a proportionate number thereof, in ten minutes, at the Westminster pit, on Tuesday, March 1st, 1825. The receipts of the pit to be presented to the distressed widow of the late C. Dew, who was the owner of this matchless canine performer. After which a dog fight, a tarr loose match, with two dogs and two fresh badgers, a drawing match, and several bull dogs to be tried at the bear, before their departure for foreign climes. Billy can be matched to kill 100 rats against any two dogs in England, for 100 sovereigns. Doors open at seven, commence at half-past. Admittance 3s. each."

Now all such sports, as they are termed, bull fights, bull baiting, bear baiting, dog fights, cock fighting, and so on, are spectacles of unmixed barbarity: they have no redeeming qualities, or tendencies: they fix the contemplation of the spectator, and they attempt to fix it with pleasure, on what is purely savage, fierce, and ferocious. The human mind is so constituted, that in proportion as they succeed in this object, they must assimilate it to the qualities which it contemplates with gratification: to the disposition of the animals on which it gazes with delighted interest: the principle of association—that principle which influences so powerfully all the trains of human thought and emotion, and by which they are united together, would cease to operate, or would operate contrary to its fixed law, were it otherwise: but the operation of that law is as steady as the operation of the law of gravitation. And that the human mind can be brought to contemplate unmixed fierceness, and barbarity; that it can be trained to gaze with delight on the lacerated body of a living creature; on the effusion of its blood; on its convulsions and writhings, produced by intolerable anguish; that it can be brought to listen, with intense interest, to its howl-ings of agony, is an ascertained fact. Even the most delicate females of a refined people, in a refined age, refined at least in the common estimation, have crowded to such spectacles, and contemplated them with intense interest. They have done so, and they do so still in Spain; and Spain affords an admirable illustration of the result we wish to point out. The same women who contemplate with delight, the savage spectacle of a bull-fight, regard as a gay and brilliant pageant, the immolation of human beings in an auto da fê. This exemplifies in a striking manner, the direct and inviolable tendency of such exhibitions. Animal suffering is witnessed, not only without horror, but with delight: by an easy and unavoidable transition, this cruelty to animals passes into cruelty to men, and precisely in the same manner, and for the same reason, that the ferocious spectacle of a bull-fight is contemplated with pleasure, the horrible exhibition of an auto da fê is looked upon as a splendid amusement.

In a note to Childe Harold, it is stated, that at the Spanish bull-fights, the wounds and death of the horses are accompanied with the loudest acclamations, and many gestures of delight, especially from the female portion of the audience, including those of the gentlest blood: that the author of Childe Harold, the writer of the note, and one or two other Englishmen, were, during the summer of 1809, in the governor's box, at the great amphitheatre of Santa Maria, opposite to Cadiz. The death of one or two horses, after having seen them before they expired gallop round the arena with their bowels trailing on the ground, satisfied their curiosity. "A gentleman present, "observing them shudder and look pale, "noticed that unusual reception of so "delightful a sport to some young ladies, "who stared and smiled, and continued "their applauses as another horse fell "bleeding to the ground. One bull killed "three horses off his own horns."

This is a faithful picture of the influence of such sports on human feeling, and consequently on human action. Here then is ground for the interference of the legislator: here is a sound principle on which he may interpose to prohibit such spectacles. They are injurious to human beings: they produce trains of feeling, and generate habits of action, which are dangerous to the well-being of society: legislation therefore in exerting its authority to put them down, is in the proper exercise of its special and peculiar function. But then it is obvious, that its object is the protection, not of animals, but of men: did such spectacles produce noble, generous, and benignant feelings in the human bosom, instead of the opposite, it would be right not to prohibit, but to encourage them. On this principle, the legislator leaves out of his consideration, as he ought to do, the condition of the animals: good may result to some animals from the course he takes: but that, as far as he is concerned, is purely incidental, and neither is, nor need be, in his contemplation: it is the well-being of men, as members of the social state, and that only, for which he can attempt to make provision.

It is singular, that among all the members who took part in the debates on this subject throughout the last year, two only perceived this principle.

In the debate on Tuesday, March 11th, Mr. William Smith appears to understand it clearly, and seizes, as an illustration of his argument, the very fact to which we have adverted.

"With what severity of remark," he says, "did they find their countrymen, in all their books of travels, constantly speaking of the bull-fights of Spain—a sport which was as much admired by the higher as the lower orders in that country. They readily saw those faults in others, which they refused to correct in themselves. In his opinion, the habit of seeing bull-fights, had prepared the Spaniards to look without horror on an auto da fê. It was certainly a step towards that goal of cruelty. Hogarth had well described the progress of cruelty in a series of prints. The hero of the piece began his career by spinning a cockchafer, and terminated it by the murder of the woman whom he had seduced."

Now this is the exact and decisive argument, clearly and precisely stated.

In the same debate, Sir Francis Burdett stated this principle still more distinctly, as a principle. He is reported to have said—

"It appeared very strange that in the course of the discussion the most important part of the subject had been overlooked—he meant the injurious effect which such scenes had on the morals of society. Putting all other considerations out of view—considering that he was not legislating on a principle of humanity towards brutes, but for men—he could not avoid giving his support to the bill. The common law of England justified the principle of interfering with regard to any thing which had a tendency to injure the morals of the community, and cruelties were on principle punishable by common law at the present moment. The object of the bill was merely to carry that principle into effect in those atrocious cases which shocked the public mind*."

In these few words the true principle which ought to have guided the legislature is stated in a clear and scientific manner, and with the exception of that part of Mr. William Smith's speech which we have quoted, they constitute the only good sense, relative to this part of the subject, which was delivered in the house, in all the discussions that took place upon it, from the beginning to the end of the session.

There is then, at least, a distinction between spectacles of this kind and field-sports. It may be wise for the legislature to interfere with the one, and unwise to meddle with the other—it may be possible to check the one, impossible to interfere with success in the other; but that can be no reason for abstaining to do good, at least as far as it can be effected. Yet so completely have these two cases been confounded together, that not only did almost every member who took part in these discussions assume them to be analogous, but they even grounded an argument against all legislative interference on that very analogy. This, indeed, is the main argument on which the opponents of Mr. Martin make their stand. Mr. Peel urges it against him in the most triumphant manner, and seems to imagine that it is not only conclusive, but overwhelming.

"Why," says he, "should the hon. gent. stop at the ill-treatment of bears, and monkeys, and dogs? Was there more cruelty in baiting a bear than in hunting a stag? There was a difference, it was true. The bear was left in possession of all his natural means of defence: to qualify the stag for hunting, the horns were in the first place cut off. Then what did his hon. friend say to pigeon-shooting, where one gentleman would bet another gentleman a sum of money that he would kill more pigeons in a minute with a double-barrelled gun? Could any thing exceed the torment of trout-fishing? Why did his hon. friend give relief to bears, and dogs, and monkeys, and refuse it to hares, and foxes, and badgers? Was not this instituting a favoured class of animals†?"

Then, alluding to some provisions of Mr. Martin's bill, Mr. Peel states, that

"According to them, a magistrate who had slept upon a bed the night before, filled with feathers plucked from the back of a living goose—riding home from a fox-chase to dine upon crimped cod—might take up, commit, or otherwise punish any person whom he might find engaged in fighting a domesticated animal, or otherwise ill-treating the same. This could never be borne. He objected to the bill because it tended to create a favoured class of animals. If the principle were good at all, it ought to be extended to all cases of cruelty. Let his hon. friend introduce a bill to prevent hunting, shooting, fishing, and other sanguinary sports, and then bear-baiting, and dog-fighting, and cock-fighting might fall within it. At present his measure was not one of equal justice."

This is abundantly sufficient to shew the confusion of ideas in Mr. Peel's mind: he is evidently ignorant of the distinction, the clear perception of which could alone guide him to a just decision. The proper answer to his argument it must be needless to state. Sir Francis Burdett alone seems to state the distinction clearly. He is reported to have said, "That it was not fair to draw any comparison between field-sports and the sports (if they could be so called), which the hon. member desired to put down—that the former were conducive to health and activity—every faculty of the body being called into action in their pursuit: that the latter were merely spectacles of unminged barbarity—animals being set to tear each other to pieces for the gratification of a multitude who stood passively looking on: that these scenes were highly injurious to the morals of the community: that on this ground, putting all other considerations out of view—considering that he was not legislating on a principle of humanity towards brutes, but for men—he could not avoid giving his consent to the bill."

There is another, and a totally different ground, on which it may be proper for the legislature to suppress these savage sports. Such spectacles may be the means of bringing together, and of uniting for concert and co-operation, the bad portion of society. The thief, the robber, the murderer, may avail himself of them as affording convenient places in which to meet his associates; in which to plan future rapine and violence. He could not choose scenes more in unison with his purpose or with the means by which he aims to effect it. If experience show that these sports do really collect such people together, and that bad consequences result to society from their assembling in bodies, that is a sufficient reason why the legislature should interfere to prohibit such spectacles. Whatever might be the alleged purpose of any assemblage of people, that would be a sufficient reason to interdict their meeting. If stag-hunting, fox-hunting, coursing, fishing, were attended with this result, these sports ought to be prohibited for the same reason. This part of the subject then resolves itself into a question of fact: Is it, or is it not true, that the scenes in which these exhibitions take place, form the haunts of the villanous and the desperate, and that it is there they plan their future depredations on the community? On this subject Mr. Martin has collected a great deal of valuable evidence, and it is one of the very few points in which he is always sound and always logical. He states that he has conversed with every alderman of the city of London; with almost every police magistrate in the various districts of the metropolis, with many magistrates in different parts of the country; that from much conversation with them he has ascertained the conclusion to which their experience has conducted them: that their unanimous opinion is, that these cruel practices ought to be put down; that they have assured him over and over again that nothing is more conducive to crime than such sports; that they lead the lower orders to gambling; that they educate them for thieves, and that they gradually train them up to bloodshed and murder: that not only the magistrates of Westminster, but that ten to one of the magistrates throughout England and Ireland are in favour of the prohibition of these sports: that they are great authorities, and that their opinion ought not to be disregarded*. Sir Francis Burdett also states, that the persons who join in these sports are the very nuisance of society, and that the neighbourhood in which they are pursued is the worst in the metropolis†. It is singular that this argument has never been met by those who take the opposite side. We have searched through all the reports of the debates on the subject from the beginning to the end of the session, with the special purpose of ascertaining what was said in answer to these statements. Not a single member made the slightest allusion to them. Neither the Secretary for the Home Department, nor Sir M. W. Ridley, nor Mr. Heathcote, nor Mr. Fyshe Palmer, nor any one of the opponents of Mr. Martin venture to meet him on this ground. There is only one reason for this silence; but that is satisfactory: they have nothing to say, and in this instance, as if by a miracle, they are conscious of it.

Mr. Martin's argument is altogether unanswerable: it affords sufficient ground to justify and to require the interference of the legislature, to put down all sports of this kind, and not only such sports, but any thing whatever, by whatever name called, or for whatever purpose pursued, which is attended with such consequences.

Sports, then, which affect animals, so far as they form a subject for the consideration of the legislature, are of two different kinds: First, those from which advantage results to man, as amusement and exercise; and of which the disadvantages may seem to some questionable, remote, or not preponderant; such for example, as hunting:—with these it may be inexpedient for the legislature to interfere: Secondly, sports from which injury, appreciable and definable, does result to men; namely, those, the direct and necessary tendency of which, is to generate, in the spectators, cruel and ferocious dispositions:—with these the legislature not only may, but ought to interfere, because the chief object of government itself, is to protect the community from that violence, which is the immediate and certain result of cruel and ferocious dispositions. More especially ought it to interfere where such sports bring together the vicious part of the community, tend to confirm their vicious propensities, and facilitate the gratification of them.

The chief argument against the abolition of these degrading and savage spectacles, is, that it would be to put down the sports of the poor, while no attempt is made to interfere with those of the rich. One would think there must be something extremely plausible in this argument, for those who took the leading part in the debate, insisted upon it with an air of perfect triumph, and it appears to have imposed upon the rest: at least, not a single member, with the exception of Mr. William Smith, gave the slightest hint that he doubted of its validity‡. Thus Mr. Heathcote makes it the precise ground of his moving for the rejection of Mr. Martin's bill§. He maintains that if the bill were good for any thing, it would prevent cruelty in the upper ranks, no less than in the lower: that it would prevent hunting, shooting, and fishing: that it was imposable to make a law to prevent bear-baiting, and to leave stag-hunting uncontrolled: that they must, if they acted justly, interfere with the amusements of the country gentlemen: that the King himself kept stag-hounds; that many noblemen; that many honourable gentlemen in his view, had been seen attending the hunts: that they could not make one law for the rich and another for the poor: that there was no justice in the measure, and that he would therefore take the liberty to move, that the bill be read a second time this day six months. Mr. Peel argued in the same strain*. Mr. G. Lamb maintained that the moment the sports of the lower orders were invaded, the observations of the rt. hon. secretary, relative to the sports of the higher orders, applied with a force that could not be answered†. Mr. Brougham too appears to have been carried away by the prevailing delusion; for though he did not take any part in the discussions during the last Session, yet he is stated by Mr. Martin to have complained on a former occasion, that he (Mr. Martin) meddled only with the sports of the poor, while he turned away his eyes from those of the rich; and to have declared, that if it could be shewn, that the nobility took part in these sports, he would join with all his heart in putting them down‡. Now, the short and decisive answer to all this, is—that the sports in question ought to be put down, because they are injurious to the community; injurious, in the two-fold manner which has been stated: that the accident that they are frequented by the poor and not by the rich, does not in the least change their nature: that were the sports indulged in by the rich, productive of evil to society, they ought to be abolished for that very reason: that the rank of those who pursue a sport is not the thing to be considered, but the influence of the sports on the community: that whatever is productive of evil, ought to be prevented, and for that reason, whoever attend it: that whatever is not productive of evil, ought to be allowed for that reason, whoever do not attend it.

In point of fact, the justice of the principle on which this reasoning is founded, has not only been recognised, but acted upon by the legislature. The amusements of the lower orders, actually are under the surveillance of the police. It is justly stated by Mr. Wm. Smith, that the public-houses are not as open to the amusements of the poor, as the great taverns and assembly-rooms are to those of the rich. This is a distinct recognition, that amusements—and that amusements pursued by particular classes, may be interfered with. It is not, however, proper to say, that the amusements of the poor are interfered with; much less that they are interfered with, because they are the amusements of the poor. The correct statement is—that the meeting of certain classes of the people, in certain places, for the purpose of amusement, has been found by experience, to be productive of evil consequences to the public: that the meeting of other classes, in other places, for the purpose of amusement, has not been found productive of evil consequences to the public; and that, therefore, the former has been placed under control, while the latter has not.

3. The third class of cases to be considered, is that in which animals are made to suffer, or are deprived of life, by wanton cruelty; from the unrestrained indulgence of passion; or from malevolence. The infliction of suffering on animals wantonly; tormenting them for the mere purpose of tormenting them, is so alien to the human heart, that if there be any examples of it on record, they must be extremely rare. The propensity is not natural to man; there is no conceivable inducement why he should indulge it: all the instances of those who have done so (if any such exist) are probably cases in which the natural propensities are deranged, in consequence of imbecility or alienation of mind. Were it otherwise; were it an ascertained fact, that there are persons who take a delight in tormenting animals, for the mere purpose of witnessing their sufferings, it would be right to prohibit them from indulging such a propensity; for two reasons—first, because, as we have already shewn, by a fundamental principle of the human mind, cruelty to animals will be sure to produce cruelty to men: secondly, because were many persons allowed to commit such practices, their example would have a dreadful influence in vitiating the dispositions of those who witnessed them.

† Ante, p. 549.

strained indulgence of violent passion, or of a brutal disposition. Violent passions and brutal dispositions are dangerous things: on whatever else exercised, they may be easily directed against the peace and happiness of men: to check their production and indulgence is one of the main objects of legislation itself; and therefore of course, it is legitimately employed in counteracting their generation and indulgence in any particular instance. If the unprotected condition of animals afford an occasion for the excitement and gratification of such passions and dispositions, it is proper that the legislature should interfere to alter the condition of animals—not for the sake of the animals, but in order to control dangerous dispositions and passions in men. Dispositions and passions which endanger the safety of the community ought to be controlled in this as in every other case. And that fierce and ferocious passions wreaked on brute animals are dangerous to the community of human beings, is certain, for the reason so often assigned—that these passions when once excited are easily directed against men, and are sure to be so sooner or later. Again, animals may be property; in that case, they may be protected against injurious treatment on the same principle as any other species of property. It must be admitted, however, that animals may be most cruelly treated—cruelly treated in the strict and proper sense of that word, because the suffering inflicted may answer, and may tend to answer no good object or end, without materially injuring them as property. In that case such injurious treatment may be prevented on the principle just stated, the pernicious tendency of the uncontrolled indulgence of the passions and dispositions which lead to its infliction, and the annoyance to the sympathies of unwilling spectators. Offenders in such cases in the public streets might fairly be punished as public nuisances.

Animals in which men have a property are, indeed, the animals chiefly exposed to cruelty, arising from the passion or brutality of those to whose care they are committed,—for example, drovers of cattle, and those who have the care of horses, more especially hackney coachmen. Now in reference to this class of animals the legislature has recently recognized and acted upon the principle here laid down; and we are glad of it; first, on account of the distinct recognition of that principle, and, secondly, on account of the actual benefit which has already resulted from putting its operation to the test of experience. It appears that during the last year, one hundred and forty-four convictions for the cruel treatment of animals have been obtained under the act entitled “an act to prevent the cruel and improper treatment of cattle;” that these convictions have taken place chiefly among bullock drovers, but partly among those who have the care of horses, and who by furious riding or driving, not only injure those animals but also incur the hazard of destroying human life: that the success of these prosecutions in preventing the evil has been greater than it is possible for any one whose mind has not been turned to the observation of such matters to imagine: that of all the spots in the kingdom, that most disgraced by the repetition of barbarous cruelties, wreaked week after week on defenceless animals, was Smithfield market: that the scene there is now so much altered that it is hardly possible to recognize the same unfeeling class of men that used to be employed in driving cattle, and that some of the most respectable inhabitants of the houses which surround the market-place, have borne testimony to this fact*.

For the law just referred to, the public is indebted to Mr. Martin, and it owes him much for it. By this act a penalty of not less than ten shillings, and not more than five pounds, is liable to be imposed upon any one who is convicted of wantonly and cruelly beating, abusing, or ill-treating any horse, ox, sheep, or other cattle; and according to the statement of the committee of the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, the convictions already obtained under this act, have been so successful as to have completely changed the scene at Smithfield market. This testimony is satisfactory: it proves the beneficial operation of the act, it proves its adequacy to correct the evil. Mr. Martin should therefore have rested satisfied and not have attempted to do more; both because to do too much in legislation is worse than to do too little; and because the legislator who attempts to do too much, lesssens his power to carry into effect that which would be really useful. For his motion on Monday, March 24th*, for leave to bring in a bill to amend this act, by making the offence a misdemeanor and leaving the punishment of it to the discretion of the magistrates at Quarter Sessions, he does not offer a single reason. The motion was rejected, and justly, on the ground that legislation on this subject had already proceeded far enough, and that Mr. Martin, if he could succeed in pushing it farther, would only weaken the effect of his former bill.

4. We come now, in the last place, to the consideration of a very interesting and important branch of this subject, namely, the infliction of pain on animals with a view to the advancement of science. Almost the only science in which it is necessary to make animals suffer, in order to ascertain any facts relating to it, is that of medicine; using the term medicine in its most comprehensive signification; and almost the only persons who actually perform scientific experiments on living animals, are members of the medical profession. Before the reader can have got to the end of the sentence which announces this fact, we should think it must have excited in his mind a train of ideas calculated to satisfy him that of all the suffering inflicted by man upon animals either directly or indirectly, this is the most justifiable.

In the first place, there is no science the interest of which can be compared with that which treats of the structure and functions of the animal frame. There is no other science which presents an assemblage of facts so curious, so wonderful, so calculated to convey to the mind the most real and valuable instruction, the most useful, nay, even the most indispensable knowledge. Fortunately, almost every thing which relates to the structure of the animal frame can be ascertained by anatomy, as well and even better, on the dead subject than on the living. However, with regard to the dissection of the dead body, the most absurd prejudices have prevailed from the earliest ages; and even at the present day, so violent are they, so active, and so successful, in securing their object, that it is with the utmost difficulty that the practical anatomist in this country can procure the means of pursuing his investigations. The teacher obtrudes his course of instruction with the feeling of uncertainty, whether the means will be afforded him of demonstrating to his pupils what it is absolutely indispensable that they should know; and the student has advanced but a little way, before his studies are interrupted, and it is well if they are not terminated, at least for that season, by the want of a supply of subjects for dissection. This state of things is disgraceful to our age and country: the evils which result from it have lately been pointed out in so forcible a manner, as to have produced a very general desire in those who attend to such subjects, to see a remedy provided for them†, and an attempt will probably be made, during the ensuing session, to induce the legislature to sanction the remedy which has been suggested.

But though the structure of a part can be ascertained by the dissection of the dead body, and therefore without the infliction of pain, yet function cannot. Structure teaches nothing, or nothing with certainty respecting function. The structure of some parts has been long known, yet their function is not even yet discovered, and the function of other parts was observed from the earliest periods, while it is only recently that their structure has been demonstrated.

Physiology, or that science which treats of the functions of animal organs, is the science of life. It can therefore only be studied in the living body. It is intimately connected with Pathology—that branch of medical science which comprehends those derangements of function, and those changes of structure which constitute disease. Natural structure and healthy function must be known before diseased structure and deranged function can be understood. By the infliction of injury on certain organs of living animals, or by the removal of them from the body, great light has been thrown on what had hitherto been the hidden process of nature, both in relation to health and to disease. Experiments are also sometimes absolutely indispensable, in order to ascertain the best mode of performing capital operations; in order to discover how far such operations can be borne, and how far they cannot, and why they cannot; in order to observe the various processes which nature adopts to repair the injury inflicted on the different systems implicated in these operations—the knowledge of which processes is necessary to enable the physician and surgeon to moderate, excite, or stop them, according to the nature of the case. In all this there is not only the highest utility, but the lives of thousands of human beings absolutely depend on that clear and exact knowledge, which such experiments alone can afford.

† See Westminster Review, vol. xl. p. 59. Art. "Use of the Dead to the Living."

As to the animals which are sacrificed in these pursuits, there is one short argument which must satisfy the most sensitive mind respecting their fate. If these animals were eaten, and thus became the means of sustaining human life, no objection would be made by any one to such a disposal of them: if then they can be made to save human life, without putting them into the stomach, what reason can there possibly be why they should not be so employed?

Still, however, the question will recur, as to the utility of, at least, some of the experiments which are constantly performed and repeated. We think we have already said enough to satisfy any reasonable mind on that point: but as it is a subject of much importance, on which it is very desirable that just opinions should be formed, and correct feelings cherished, we shall show by the relation of a few facts, not indeed the extent, but the kind of good which may be expected, and which constantly results from the institution of such experiments.

We must premise, however, that the question of utility is in reality widely different from that which a superficial view of it would indicate. What is the precise, we may say, the sole object of all experimental science? It is twofold: first, to put to the test the truth of something which is supposed to be ascertained; secondly, to make new discoveries. In physiology experiment is the only possible means by which either end can be accomplished. Nothing can be considered as certainly ascertained, which cannot be made the subject of experiment, and which does not answer to the test. Nothing can be considered as certainly discovered, which if it relate to structure, cannot be demonstrated; and if to function, cannot be proved by experiment. Now, if in this sense a principle be really ascertained, it will scarcely be denied that an advantage is acquired.

The discovery and establishment of a truth, is in itself a good. No matter what the truth is—no matter whether it be, or be not immediately applicable and applied to some object of practical utility—a truth ascertained is an accession to the common stock of knowledge. No one can tell the importance of a principle when it is first discovered: no one can form a just estimate of its value: no one can ascertain the magnitude and variety of the applications of which it may be capable. A principle destined to produce vast and beneficial ends, may be thoroughly known for a long time, without effecting the slightest benefit. Its actual application to useful purposes may depend either on its combination with some other principle not yet discovered; or on the detection of some circumstance, perhaps extremely slight, not yet perceived; or on some mind, having certain faculties highly developed, devoting its attention to the subject. In either case, however capable a subject may be of producing benefit, it is obvious that it will really accomplish none, until all the circumstances which we have supposed take place. When the properties of the ellipse were first discovered, it was perceived that an important principle was ascertained; but before it could produce any beneficial result, it was necessary that a mind should arise not only capable of perceiving that it might become a mental instrument of great value, but of discriminating its precise powers, and of applying them to the accomplishment of its peculiar uses. That mind was Newton's: he saw what the instrument was capable of effecting, and perceived the proper mode of using it: and with a precision and certainty which has excited the wonder and admiration of all succeeding ages, he explained by its means all the phenomena of the heavenly bodies, and established the laws which regulate their movements. The existence of steam had been known for ages and its great power had been long observed; but it was not until the ingenuity of Watt embodied and fixed it, and made it the spirit of that mighty engine which has produced, and which is constantly producing such stupendous effects, that it was the source of any real good. Many isolated facts relative to the circulation of the blood were known previously to the time of Harvey. At length Fabricius, the preceptor of Harvey, discovered the valves of the heart: but there the discovery, as far as the preceptor is concerned, stopped. What then was the use of it? It excited the spirit of inquiry in the pupil, who reflected, and reasoned, and examined, and at last discovered the true office of the valves, and thus demonstrated the course of the circulation of the blood. That moment every body saw that a most important truth was discovered. But when, in what manner, and in what degree did it actually benefit mankind? In no manner—and in no degree for ages afterwards. Astonishing as it may appear, not a single application of the knowledge of the circulation of the blood, attended with any appreciable benefit, took place from the period of Harvey to that of John Hunter. Men talked about it and reasoned upon it: it exercised a vast influence over their conceptions and their language; but, if previously to this time any one had asked to what useful purpose it was applied, it would have been impossible to have stated any. To that profound physiologist belongs the honour of making a grand application of it. He observed the almost uniform failure of the common operation for aneurism. This led him to think of the cause of the failure. Aneurism is a disease of an artery, in which its coats become so weakened that it is incapable of resisting the current of the blood; the consequence is, that the artery dilates and forms a tumor: this tumor gradually increases: its parietes, or sides, become thinner and thinner. At length they can make no further resistance to the force that distends them from within: the tumor bursts, and the patient generally perishes from hæmorrhage. To prevent this fatal termination, surgeons were in the habit of cutting down upon the diseased artery, and applying a ligature around it just above the tumor. This operation constantly failed. Why, said John Hunter, does it fail? Probably, replied he, because a ligature applied in that situation is applied around a diseased artery. Suppose then, continued he, pursuing the train of reflection into which he had got, there be an aneurism of the artery situated in the ham: what would be the effect of applying a ligature around the main artery of the thigh soon after it issues out of the pelvis? Without doubt that would effectually take off the current of blood from the artery in the ham:

but would it not, also, as effectually deprive the whole limb, both the thigh and the leg, of the requisite quantity of blood, and would not the consequence be that the member would perish from mortification? I do not think it would, said this reflecting anatomist; because I observe that the artery gives off numerous, and large branches, above the place at which I purpose to apply the ligature: and I know, according to the laws of the circulation, that if the current of blood be stopped in one direction, it will flow with greater impetus in another: that if it cannot find a passage through the main trunk, it will seek one through the collateral branches. I suspect that these branches will themselves enlarge, in consequence of the quantity of blood which must flow through them; that thus they will accommodate themselves to circumstances, and afford to the limb a sufficient supply of nourishment. So satisfied was he that this reasoning was founded on just physiological principles, that he boldly cut down on the main artery of the thigh, and placed a ligature around it, in order to cure an aneurism seated in the ham. The success of the operation was complete. The ligature being applied around a healthy artery, its sides united and no hæmorrhage followed: though the blood was prevented from flowing through the main artery of the limb, yet a sufficient quantity for its nourishment continued to circulate through the collateral branches: that operation which before almost invariably failed, was now attended with almost uniform success; the preservation of hundreds of lives was the immediate consequence, and hundreds of lives continue to be saved by it every year. Here then is a striking illustration of the manner in which a principle known for ages, but applied to no practical use, may ultimately become the means of preserving life to an incalculable extent. Because a principle is not immediately applied to some beneficial purpose, to imagine that it is therefore useless, is an ignorant and childish notion. That which is unapplied, and therefore unproductive now, may speedily be the means of producing to vast numbers, benefit the most inestimable.

In examining the question of utility, it is essential to bear these considerations in mind; but they do not constitute the most important part of the subject. The usefulness of experiments on living animale does not rest on prospective and possible advantage; the good which results from them is often, not only great, but direct and immediate. From the experiments of Magendie on the nuxvomica, has resulted a valuable remedy in paralysis of the extremities, arising from disease of the spinal marrow. From the experiments of Dr. Edwards, of Paris, has resulted the clear and complete elucidation of, at least, one fact, the knowledge of which will be the means of saving the lives of thousands of human beings. Among all the experiments which have been instituted, either in ancient or in modern times, we are not acquainted with any which have been conducted in a manner more truly scientific, and which have led to results more interesting and important, and the evidence of which has been adduced with more clearness and precision, than those which have been carried on by this distinguished physiologist. By evidence the most lucid and decisive, he has established several facts, relative to the most important functions of the animal economy, the establishment of any one of which would formerly have been sufficient to have handed down the name of the experimentalist with honour to posterity. But our present concern is only with that part of his experiments which relates to temperature. It had formerly been supposed, that the power of generating heat in young animals was great. This notion, not founded on any positive proof, was, however, supported by several reasons which appeared plausible. The generation of animal heat, was conceived to be essentially connected with the circulation of the blood; the more rapid the circulation, the more intense appeared to be the heat. Now in young animals the circulation is extremely rapid; rapid in proportion to their youth; the inference, therefore, seemed obvious, that the younger the animal, the greater is its power of generating heat. This plausible reasoning produced that conviction in men's minds, which ought only to have been the result of positive proof. That conviction became universal. The application was immediate. Young animals, it was said, having a great power of generating heat, will be invigorated by cold; expose them then to the cold air, plunge them into cold water; that power of keeping up a continual fire within them, with which nature has endowed them, will secure them from injury, while the cold will strengthen their constitution, render them hardy, robust, and vigorous, and afford them the best possible protection against the bad effects of the changing and chilling temperature of these northern climes. This advice, which the eloquence of Rousseau, supported as it was by professional authority, rendered it fashionable to observe all over Europe, was pregnant with danger. The notion on which it rested is a complete delusion. This has been ascertained in the fullest manner by the physiologist to whom we have alluded. In the course of his experiments, Dr. Edwards observed that warm blooded animals differ from each other in a remarkable manner, in the power they possess of generating heat; that some, if exposed to the air in spring, or even in summer, will speedily become nearly as cold as vertebrated animals with cold blood; that others in the same circumstances, will preserve a constant heat, considerably above the temperature of the surrounding air; that all animals born with the eyes closed, belong to the first, and all born with their eyes open, belong to the second class; but the most singular fact, and that which is of most importance to observe here, is, that the young of all animals whatever, or at least of all animals belonging to the class mammalia, uniformly have a temperature considerably less than that of their parents. After careful and accurate examination, Dr. Edwards ascertained that their temperature is always at least from one to two degrees less than that of adult animals. He found that the same is true in regard to man. Having ascertained the mean temperature of the human body, by observations taken on twenty adults, he examined the temperature of six infants, from a few hours to two days old; he found that their mean temperature was nearly two degrees below the mean temperature of adults. While prosecuting these inquiries, an opportunity occurred to him of observing the temperature of an infant born at the seventh month. At the time the observation was taken, the infant was three hours old; it was in perfect health, and was near a good fire. Its temperature was found to be nearly two degrees lower than the mean temperature of the six infants who had been previously examined, and who were born at the full period of gestation. This remarkable difference of temperature, thus clearly ascertained, established two facts of great importance.

1. That infants have less power of generating heat than adults. 2. That the younger the infant, the less is its power of generating heat. The rapidity with which the temperature of young animals is diminished, and the extent of that diminution was ascertained by the following experiments. Two kittens, one day old, were exposed to the air of an apartment, the temperature of which was 11° of Reaumur. The temperature of the kittens when first exposed to the air was 37°; at the end of one hour and twenty-five minutes, the temperature of one of the kittens had fallen to 17°, that of the other to 18°; they had both become rigid, and nearly insensible. Four puppies, just born, having a temperature of from 35° to 36°, were exposed to the air of an apartment, the temperature of which was 11°. In the space of time included from nine o'clock in the morning to ten o'clock in the evening, their temperature had fallen to 13° 14'. They were so exceedingly enfeebled that they had nearly lost all power of motion. Symptoms of debility and suffering, began to appear almost immediately after their exposure to the air, and increased in proportion as their temperature fell. Similar effects were produced in young birds by exposing them to air of the same temperature, but in a still greater degree; because the power of young birds to generate heat is still less than that of the young mammalia. When these young creatures are on the point of expiring, in consequence of this exposure to the cold, they are reanimated with certainty and ease, by warming them before the fire, or by immersing them in a warm bath. Even when they are totally deprived of the power of motion, and appear quite dead, they are restored without difficulty by the same means.

These facts are of extreme interest and importance. Their application to practice is obvious, and the benefit which the knowledge of them is capable of conferring on the human race, can be estimated only by those whose profession has led them to observe the fatal effects of cold on infants and children. Instinct prompts mothers to keep their infants warm; but philosophers sometimes, as we have seen, by reasoning extremely specious, have urged them to depart from this principle, and persuaded them to endeavour to strengthen the constitution, and to harden the frame of their tender babes, by exposing them to external cold. The observations and experiments of Dr. Edwards have at length set that notion at rest. No longer will such absurd language be held; no more will such perilous practices be repeated. The provision which nature has adopted for securing to the young of birds and of the mammalia a constant and equable heat, is wonderful. First, they are shielded from external cold by the closeness with which they are packed together, and kept in mutual contact in their nest: secondly, they are effectively secured from the agency of external temperature by that instinct which causes the mother constantly to sit over her young, and completely to cover them. Thus, incapable of generating the requisite degree of heat themselves, they are surrounded with an artificial temperature of nature's own providing, nearly as great as that of their parents. It is ascertained, by direct experiment, that young birds will perish in air the temperature of which is equal to the medium heat of the year: nay, that they will die from cold if exposed to the air, even in the height of summer. Observation shews that exposure to cold is equally fatal to the young of the human being. We ourselves remember two instances of infants who perished with amazing rapidity from sudden exposure to severe cold. They turned of a leaden hue: the circulation of the blood seemed suddenly to stop, and they expired almost instantaneously.

Dr. Edwards has certainly inflicted pain on a few frogs, and deprived some kittens of life, in pursuing the experiments which have brought these important facts to light; but there are hundreds of mothers, in all the nations of Europe, who will have reason to thank him for the preservation of their children.

Some exceedingly curious and important experiments have been made by Monsieur Dumas, of Paris, on transfusion. This operation, formerly not unfrequently practised, had long been laid aside as useless and even dangerous. It consists in transfusing into the veins of one animal the blood which is flowing in those of another. The extensive and important applications of which this process is capable, provided experience prove it to be at all practicable and useful, must at once strike every reader; even though he should be less acquainted than usual with medical subjects.

The truth is, the operation sometimes succeeded, but oftener failed. Monsieur Dumas has had the great merit of establishing, by direct experiment, the precise circumstances which are essential to secure its success. He has shown that it is absolutely essential that the blood which is transfused into any animal should be taken from another animal of the same species; that, for example, to transfuse into the veins of a bird the blood of a lamb, would not only not benefit the former, but would be certainly fatal to it. He has discovered and assigned the reason. The blood vessels of an animal are adapted to the nature of its blood; but the nature of the blood differs essentially in animals of different classes. The red particles vary both in figure and magnitude in all the classes. We need look no farther, then, for the reason of the fatal consequences which result from transfusing the blood of an animal of one species into the veins of an animal of a different species; because, if innumerable particles of a large diameter are poured into vessels adapted only for particles of a small diameter, it is obvious that an impediment absolutely insuperable is opposed to the circulation, and consequently, that death must ensue. Great praise is due to Monsieur Dumas for pointing out this important circumstance, and great praise ought to be awarded to him for the clear and decisive manner in which he has conducted his experiments. Thus, he bled animals until all signs of life were at an end, until they were to all appearance quite dead, and absolutely irrecoverable by any means hitherto known. He then transfused into their veins the blood of healthy animals of the same species. They uniformly recovered from the state of apparent death; regained their former strength, and continued to enjoy their usual activity and health without sustaining the slightest appreciable disadvantage. These experiments are decisive as to the amazing power of the expedient. Its application to practice is obvious and direct. In cases of violent hæmorrhage, for example, we are led, by the closest analogy, to conclude, that it would be certainly successful. In that hæmorrhage, especially, which so often takes place in the puerperal state, and which is so frequently fatal, were a portion of the blood of a healthy woman to be transfused into the veins of the exhausted and sinking mother, it is probable that life would be saved in numerous instances. Nay, this is no longer a mere conjecture: the experiment has been made in England, and with complete success. Apparently, without being at all aware of what had been done on this subject in France, in which country, indeed, no practical application of it, as far as we have heard, has yet been attempted, the operation has actually been tried by Dr. Blundell and others, in London, with a more decided and uniform success than could have been anticipated. No less than three successful cases of it have recently been placed on record. In all, life would have been extinguished in a few hours but for this operation: in all, the relief was immediate and most striking. In one case, the medical attendants were of opinion, that the woman could not have lived more than three hours: six ounces of blood were injected into the median vein of the arm: the patient immediately exclaimed (to use her own expression) that she felt as strong as a bull: after eight ounces more were injected, her recovery was complete: she declared that she felt herself well enough to get up and walk, and no bad symptom has supervened. In the last case, that of a lady of extremely delicate constitution, the wife of a member of the House of Commons, the powers of life were nearly exhausted from profuse hæmorrhage. All her medical attendants declared that she could not possibly have survived many hours; and that no other known remedy could have saved her. One of her physicians, and her apothecary, furnished to their patient each six ounces of their blood, which were injected by a syringe into her vein. From that moment her relief was decided: her recovery, though not so rapid as in the former case, has been progressive and steady. These cases, important as they are, form only one kind of application of which this remedy is capable, and are adduced merely as an example. Cases in which it would probably be highly beneficial must crowd upon every mind which is familiar with such subjects.

At the very time we are writing, Dr. Barry, of Paris, is engaged in a series of experiments, the application of which promises to be immediate and of high importance. Having been led by some former experiments to conjecture, that absorption cannot take place in a vacuum, he performed the following experiment, in order to ascertain the fact. He carefully removed the hair from the outer part of a dog's thigh, so as to expose the skin. He then caused a venomous serpent to inflict in immediate succession on this portion of the dog's thigh, two bites. As soon as the wounds were made, he applied a cupping-glass over the part bitten, and retained it there nearly an hour. At the end of that period, the dog rose from the table, and walked with tolerable ease: he continued in perfect health, and not the slightest symptom of injury from the bites supervened. A pigeon was bitten by the same serpent, about an hour after it had twice bitten the dog: nothing was done to counteract the effects of the wound: the pigeon expired in agony and convulsions, twenty minutes after its infliction. If further experiments confirm the obvious inference suggested by this, there is discovered an easy and certain remedy for the bite of poisonous and rabid animals. Hydrophobia, that horrible, and hitherto incurable disease, will no longer hold in its appalling and destructive course. To put an effectual stop to this frightful malady, it will be necessary only to apply a cupping-glass over the wounded part.

Though obliged to touch so lightly on this part of the subject, we have said enough to shew the utility of experiments made on animals, with a view to discover and advance physiological knowledge. In these experiments, without doubt, many animals suffer pain, and some are deprived of life; but the consequence is the mitigation of human suffering, and the protraction of human life to an incalculable extent. To view with jealousy, suspicion, or dislike, those who pursue such researches, is highly unjust, and ungrateful; and to think of requiring the legislature to interfere with their investigations, is downright insanity.

But some persons who admit, that such experiments are proper and necessary, raise an objection to them on the ground of number. One or two experiments, say they, may be justifiable; but there can be no necessity for performing experiment after experiment of the same kind. The truth is, the number must be that, to whatever it may amount, which is necessary to ascertain the point under investigation: whatever stops short of this, for the sake of economizing suffering and life, renders all the preceding expenditure of suffering and life useless.—Others, again, object to the repetition of experiments. When a point has been once made out, they say, it ought to be considered sufficient, and its truth admitted, without the infliction of further suffering. There is little reason to apprehend a too frequent repetition of such experiments. Most minds are so constituted, that they will be abundantly satisfied with testimony relative to such matters: but if a person wish to investigate them for himself, and to carry on the researches which have been commenced, it is absurd to suppose, that he is not to examine the accuracy of the statements of his predecessors.—The public exhibition of these experiments has also been objected to: by the public, being of course meant, an assemblage of persons, whose studies or professions render such investigations a matter of peculiar importance and interest to them. But if an experiment be performed before one hundred persons, that instruction is afforded by means of one animal, which it would require one hundred to communicate, were each to perform the experiment for himself in private. The proper method of performing the experiment, is at the same time shewn to every person who is present, and thus those who repeat the experiment for their own satisfaction, are prevented from inflicting much needless suffering.

On the whole, then, it must be evident, that experiments on living animals are indispensable; and that were they to be suspended, the consequence would be suffering and death to men, to an extent that cannot be estimated. So far is it from being necessary to call in the aid of the legislature to check investigations of this kind, or to apply any popular check to keep them within due control, that, on the contrary, a stimulus is required to excite professional and scientific men to pursue them with proper zeal and perseverance. They are naturally disgusting. The aversion they excite cannot be overcome, except by an ardent desire to gain knowledge, and to render it subservient to the welfare of mankind—a much more ardent desire than is commonly felt. Nor is there the slightest ground for the apprehension, that persons in whom such a desire exists, will inflict unnecessary suffering. That constitution of mind which is alone compatible with the existence of such a desire, is invariably connected with a more than ordinary degree of talent: such talent as is usually accompanied (and real talent is in general accompanied) with a strong perception of the true relations of things: the moral excellencies of the heart, are in almost invariable alliance with the clear discernment of the understanding: wherever passion does not pervert the judgment (and here passion can have no existence) a man is generally benevolent in proportion as he is intelligent: there are few examples on record of a disjunction of goodness from wisdom: splendid attainments in philosophy have ever been, and ever will be, united with the mild, and gentle, and benignant virtues: the link which connects humanity with science, is seldom absent, and can seldom be broken. In the structure of the human mind, then, in the very nature of things, the public have a complete security, that men of science will not, and cannot be guilty of wanton cruelty.

It has been a source of peculiar satisfaction to us to observe, how distinctly and uniformly this has been recognised in all that has passed in Parliament. With the single exception of Mr. Martin, there is not a member who did not admit the necessity of experiments for the purpose of science, and disclaim all idea of danger, from allowing to scientific men the most unbounded licence. Even Earl Grosvenor, who, in the House of Lords, presented a petition from some foolish men, praying that a stop might be put to experiments on animals, states, that it must be acknowledged, that these experiments had led to discoveries highly beneficial to the human race: and particularly adverted to the experiments performed "by Bell, Brodie, and other eminent surgeons, in consequence of which the operations of tying the aorta, amputating the thigh at the hip-joint, &c. had been successfully performed."

Mr. Martin's ideas on the subject may be gathered from his attack on one of the most distinguished physiologists of the age. The absurdity of the charges which he brings against Dr. Magendie are paralleled only by their falsehood. He states that Dr. Magendie, in the course of last year, in one of the anatomical theatres

"He would not trust himself to express a further opinion upon this fellow's conduct, but would merely say that he looked upon those who witnessed it, without interfering to prevent it, almost in the light of criminals:" that "this Mr. Magendie got a lady's greyhound, for which he paid the sum of ten guineas—that he first of all nailed its front and then its hind paws to the table, with the bluntest spikes that he could find; giving as a reason for so doing, that the poor beast in its agonies might tear away from the spikes, if they were at all sharp and cutting:" that "he then doubled up its long ears, and nailed them down to the table with similar spikes (loud cries of hear, and shame):" that "he then made a gash down the middle of its face, and proceeded to dissect the nerves on one side of it:" that "he first of all cut out those nerves which belong to the sight, and whilst performing the operation, said to the spectators, 'Observe, when I pass my scalpel over these nerves, the dog will shut its eyes:' that it did so: that he then proceeded to operate upon those of taste and hearing: that after he had finished these operations, he put some bitter food on the tongue of the dog, and hallooed into its ear: that the dog repudiated the food and was insensible to the sound:" that "this surgical butcher, or butchering surgeon—for he deserved both names—then turned round to the spectators, and said,—'I have now finished my operations on one side of this dog's head: as it costs so much money to get an animal of this description, I shall reserve the other side till to-morrow. If the servant take care of him for the night according to the directions I have given him, I am of opinion that I shall be able to continue my operations upon him to-morrow with quite as much satisfaction to us all as I have done to-day: but if not, though he may have lost the vivacity he has shown to-day, I shall have the opportunity of cutting him up alive, and showing you the peristaltic motion of the heart and viscera (great disgust at this statement was manifested by the house).'"

Now there is not a single allegation in this exaggerated and ignorant account that is not false. What really took place is as follows—upon the strict accuracy of this account the reader may rely—we have received it from Dr. Magendie himself, and his statement is corroborated in every particular by those who were present. When Dr. Magendie was last in London, he was requested by Mr. Brodie, Mr. Mayo, Dr. Wilson Philip, and some other distinguished physiologists, to perform certain experiments, the fame of which had spread all over Europe, in their presence: he agreed to do so: he went to the theatre with the purpose of exhibiting these experiments to these physiologists alone; but when he came thither he found the room full; and the persons present were, as he supposed, and as he still believes, members and students of the medical profession: the operations performed were two, namely, the section of the fifth pair of nerves, and the exposure and division of the anterior and posterior roots of the spinal nerves. The animals operated on were rabbits, guinea-pigs, and puppies: the operations lasted in all one hour, and were performed only on one day. The story of the greyhound is a fabrication from the beginning to the end. The dog operated on was a puppy: the experiment requires that the animal should be quite young, otherwise the vertebrae are too hard. The barbarities stated to have been practised on the dog, could not possibly have been inflicted, because they would have been fatal to the success of the experiment. Nothing whatever was done to the dog but the exposure and division of the roots of the spinal nerves: it was not kept alive after the operation: it was not operated on a second time, nor was there the least thought of subjecting it to a second experiment. The other animals operated on were killed soon after the experiment, in order to be dissected, that it might be ascertained whether the parts said to have been cut were really divided. Such are the facts. It is evident, then, that every allegation made by Mr. Martin is unfounded: the truth is, that he has been grossly imposed upon, and under the influence of the delusion practised upon him, he has calumniated in an unexampled manner a physician of whom Sir James Mackintosh says, that "When he (Sir James) resided at Paris he was introduced to Dr. Magendie by their mutual friend Baron Humboldt; and being in a state of ill health, he (Sir James) was attended by Dr. Magendie as his physician: that it had been his misfortune to suffer much from illness, but that he always felt as a considerable alleviation of that misfortune, the genuine sympathy, the true kindness, the unaffected tenderness which he had constantly experienced from the able and intelligent medical practitioners whose advice he had sought; but that he was bound in justice, and he should be base and ungrateful if he did not state the fact, that he never had been treated amongst medical men with greater care and tenderness than he had received from Dr. Magendie *."

In addition to this honourable testimony, that Dr. Magendie's character for tenderness and humanity had not been impaired by his professional pursuits, given by Sir James Mackintosh in the house, the aspersions cast on this eminent professor, immediately called forth the following letter, from those of his pupils whom his great fame had called from Britain to attend his lectures. We transcribe this letter verbatim et literatim from the original copy—it is signed by 54 British physicians and surgeons, amongst whom are names the most distinguished both for character and science, of the present age.

Paris, ce 28 Mars, 1825.

MONSIEUR,

Quoique vous ne puissiez douter de notre grand respect pour vos talents, après la célébrité de vos ouvrages en Angleterre, et l'empressement que nous montrons à venir dans cette capitale profiter de vos savantes leçons, nous nous croyons appelés à vous en renouveler l'assurance en apprenant l'attaque si injuste qui vient d'être faite sur vous dans notre Chambre des Communes.

Les expressions nous manquent, Monsieur, pour vous peindre les regrets que nous ressentons à cet égard, et surtout lorsque nous contrastons cette conduite avec l'accueil flatteur et bienveillant que nous recevons ici de vous, ainsi que de tous les professeurs de vos Ecoles; car nous sentons bien vivement tout le prix de ces bontés, ainsi que des connaissances utiles et variées que nous puissions dans vos belles institutions, où la médecine et les sciences sont cultivées avec un si brillant succès, et dont nous emporterons chez nous un souvenir ineffaçable.

La seule consolation que nous éprouvons, Monsieur, au sujet de la calomnie dont on a essayé de vous noircir, c'est que l'accusation est si outrée et absurde qu'elle tombe d'elle-même, devant l'éclat de votre réputation, couvrant de ridicule celui qui en est l'auteur, et que plusieurs de nos sénateurs distingués ont élevé leur voix pour faire une juste réparation à votre génie, que vos belles et nombreuses découvertes en physiologie feroient placer par la postérité à côté de ceux de Haller et de Harvey.

Daignez agréer, Monsieur, ce faible tribut de nos hommages, et l'assurance des sentiments de la haute considération, et de la sincère reconnaissance, de vos très humbles serviteurs.

We have dwelt the longer on this part of the subject, because it seemed peculiarly incumbent upon us to avail ourselves of the present occasion to endeavour to remove the erroneous impressions which have gone forth relative to the moral feeling of those who are devoted to the cultivation of science, and whose constant aim it is to render science the handmaid of humanity. With respect, at least, to the distinguished individual whom Mr. Martin has so grossly abused, we have done this so completely, that we do not doubt, that Mr. Martin himself will feel regret that he has been induced to give publicity to statements so utterly unfounded, expressed in language so extremely unbecoming. We believe Mr. Martin to be a man of honourable feeling, willing and anxious to make reparation for any act of injustice into which he may have been hurried. He must now be convinced, that he has misrepresented the nature of Dr. Magendie's experiments, and that he has applied injurious epithets to that gentleman's name. This he has done in the British House of Commons: he is bound, as a man of honour, to make reparation to Dr. Magendie in the same place, that there may be, at least, a chance that the corrective may extend as far as the evil has spread.

We have thus entered into a full consideration of all the parts of this subject: we have laid before the reader facts sufficient to enable him to judge of its merits for himself; and neither shall we have written, nor he have read in vain, if he rise from the perusal, with any error corrected, or any prejudice removed.

Game Laws.

THE present state of the law, as far as the killing of game is concerned, is this:—The only persons (with very insignificant exceptions) who are permitted to kill game, are those who have estates of inheritance of the value of 100*l.* a-year; estates for a term of life or leases for not less than 99 years, of the value of 150*l.* a-year; and the sons and heirs apparent of esquires, or other persons of high degree*. With respect to the consumption of game, it is by law confined to the persons who are authorized to kill it, and to those to whom they choose to give it. The buying and selling of game are both prohibited; even to persons qualified to kill it. The houses of unqualified persons may be searched, and heavy penalties are imposed for the mere possession of the sacred commodity by common beings.

In point of fact, the law of qualifications is seldom enforced to the letter, and seems, on all hands, to be acknowledged as an absurdity. The law is, indeed, absurd, if it is supposed to have reference to the wealth of the party; for no amount of personal property gives the right. It is absurd if it is supposed to refer to the possession of the land on which game is fed; for a freehold in the city of London is as good a qualification as an estate in Norfolk—it is absurd if it is supposed to have reference to rank; for the son of an esquire is often qualified when his father is not. An advancement in the scale of precedence may actually deprive a man of the qualification which he before possessed.

It is to be observed, too, as a consequence of this law, that the occupier of the land, or even the proprietor, has not necessarily a property in the game, or at least is not authorized to take it; and as a qualification by no means gives a right to enter upon land in pursuit of game, there is much of the surface of the country over which no persons can sport except by the permission of those who themselves are not authorized to do so. Besides this anomaly, as all penalties are unavailing without the means of procuring evidence, and as evidence cannot be procured against the unqualified occupiers of land, except by trespassing on their property, the law may be violated by them with impunity; and it is very likely to be habitually violated.

It may further be observed, as a consequence of this state of things, that an unqualified person, who has the misfortune to occupy land (even though he should own the fee simple) in the neighbourhood of a great preserve, may often be so overrun by these privileged vermin, as to lose a large proportion of his crops, and at the same time be wholly unable to protect himself from loss, unless he violate the law, and expose himself to the risk of a penalty.

This law, in fact, is used as a drag-net, from which those persons are selected who are deemed fit objects for punishment by the preservers of game. The persons upon whom its penalties are inflicted, are generally those to whom they are ruinous; and nothing exceeds the rigour with which the law falls on some of its victims, except the entire impunity with which the favoured class defy it. The enforcement of the law against those whom the opinion of the country gentlemen does not denounce, is considered dishonourable. The occasional resort to it, as a means of petty annoyance against one another, is deemed justifiable or not according to the provocation which forced it. The instances of convictions of this kind, are just frequent enough to make it notorious to the peasantry that the law is habitually violated, under the sanction of those who figure most as game preservers. The notoriety of the constant disregard of the law, and the taking away the direct interest in game from the occupier, who would be best able to protect it, must manifestly unsettle the moral feelings of the people respecting it, and afford facilities for its illegal destruction, which exist in the case of no other property. But, as if this were not enough, the law prohibiting the sale, superadds an irresistible temptation, by preserving to the poacher the exclusive possession of the market for game, and enlists the opinion of the great mass of consumers in his favour, by making them indebted to him for the only supply of this luxury.

* All qualified persons must also pay a tax, and receive a certificate, before they avail themselves of their qualifications. By the way, no one is entitled to shoot any sort of game except hares. The penalty for every head of game shot, under the statute of James I., which remains unrepealed, is 20*s.* Thus, by law, every sportsman in England is a poacher;—so utterly despised are these laws by the rich, while they are so rigorously enforced against the poor.

The number of persons annually incarcerated, is, on the average, 12 or 1300, for offences against the Game Laws. According to a return printed by order of the House of Commons, there were, on the 24th February, 1825, 581 persons actually in the several gaols of Great Britain, for these offences.

Great as this mass of punishment seems to be, it bears probably a small proportion to the mass of crime, for it does not seem in any perceptible degree to check it. In fact, the two parts of the Game Laws are acting in precisely opposite directions: while the penalties upon the taking of game declare that there shall not be poachers, the penalties upon the selling of game call the poacher into being, and give him the monopoly of an extensive trade. The business is carried on with so much facility, that one of the poulterers who gave evidence before the Committee of 1823, declared, that he could supply every family in London with game once a-week, throughout the year*. A great deal is spoiled on account of the over supply at particular times, and this is the only drawback on its regularity. And while esquires rage against the poachers in the country, the people of the towns are so firmly leagued in defiance of the law; the force of opinion is so powerful,—that notwithstanding the extent of the traffic, a conviction for buying or selling game, is almost unheard of; and the Act of Mr. Bankes, which made the purchase penal, made not the slightest sensation, and produced not the slightest interruption of the trade†.

The objects of Mr. S. Wortley's bill, of last session, were to abolish the law of qualifications; to make game the property of the person on whose land it was found; to allow him or any person authorized by him, and having paid the tax on game certificates, to kill it; and to allow it to be brought to market, and sold by persons licensed to deal in it. Powers were given in the bill for the summary apprehension and punishment by fine, of unauthorized destroyers of game.

It is evident from the outline of the measure, that it would remove altogether the absurdities of the law of qualifications, and put an end to the vexatious litigation that occasionally arises from this source. It would legalize the sport of those, who though they are now, according to the law, offenders, are not usually considered to be poachers. The second, and even the third sons of esquires, might sport de jure as they do de facto, on their father's estates. Who is there so barbarous as not to admit this to be an improvement? In a word, the habitual and necessary violation of the law on the part of gentlemen sportsmen, would end with such a law, and the necessity for the existence of the trade of poacher, would be also at an end. These points, whatever may be the doubts as to the general effect of the law, do not admit of dispute.

The trade of poacher is a necessary consequence of the present law, because the wealthy inhabitants of towns will have game, and because it can now be procured only by a breach of the law. "We are obliged," says one of the poulterers, in the evidence taken before the Committee, "to aid and abet the men who commit those depredations, because of the constant demand for game from different customers whom we supply with poultry. Some of the first people of the land require it of us‡." Just as evident is it, that if the proprietors of game might legally sell it, the necessity for this constant violation of the law would not exist.

† Ibid. p. 18.

True it is, that it does not absolutely follow, that because poaching would no longer be rendered necessary by the law, that it would therefore be at an end. We may coincide that it does not absolutely follow that it would be diminished. But there is the highest probability from circumstances, of the last, if not of the first of these events. Undoubtedly some game would be sold by the proprietors. The poachers, it is said, would undersell them, because the cost price of a stolen commodity, is proverbially low. But the persons who raise this objection, forget the present state of the law, which forbids the proprietors to sell game at all. To those who are not among the few and discreditable interlopers on the poachers' monopoly, game is at present of no marketable value, and those who can afford to get nothing for a commodity, can sell it as cheap as those who steal it. Preserves might be made to pay in part the expenses of the keepers, and it would be as little discreditable to avail oneself of this resource, as to sell the surplus produce of a garden in a year of plenty. As far then as the competition existed between the proprietors of the actually existing preserves and the poachers, if no other change were made than the legalizing of the sale of game, the competition would be between persons who could get game without risk, and could sell it openly, and between those who could get it only at great risk, and sell it secretly, and at inconvenient seasons. The inconveniences, which are slight to those who enjoy a monopoly, would oppress the poacher if he had to meet the owner in the market.

The opinion that poaching would increase in spite of the competition of lawful dealers, is necessarily founded, on the supposition that there would be in consequence of the legality of the sale a very great increase of demand for game. But as there is no difficulty in getting game for money—as there is no difficulty whatever in buying it—as convictions for buying or selling, at least, in towns*, are utterly unknown, and never contemplated, the consumption of it as of other delicacies is limited by the price. The price is now as low as the poachers can afford to sell it at. The mere letting in of competition could not enable them to afford it cheaper. If the demand increased it would be in consequence of the cheaper price at which the proprietors could afford it, and instead of this increased demand in its effects increasing poachers, the cause of it would necessarily be the destruction of their race.

Besides an esquire, who can only afford at present to employ two keepers, might by the sale of game afford to employ two more; and the same covert which now supports two keepers and two poachers, might, by supporting four keepers, be rid of the poachers for ever.

We have spoken chiefly with reference to preserves. In the case of the game spread over ordinary farms, the probability of poaching under the new law would be still more certainly lessened; the game, become a valuable property in the hands of the farmer, its preservation would be intrusted to persons who could most efficiently watch over it. It is utterly incredible that the supply of an important article of food, supposing raising it and the sale of it to be perfectly legal, should remain in any considerable part in the hands of the thieves. It is more easy to steal poultry than to shoot pheasants: cocks and hens are occasionally stolen, but how insignificant a fraction of our markets is supplied with the product of this species of theft!

Mr. Peel, in the discussions on the bill, while he supported it, said, that it probably would not answer all the expectations of its friends; that it would probably put an end to poaching for the sake of game, but that it would not put an end to poaching for the sake of sport. Certain it is, that the vulgar, whether from an imitation of their betters, or of the brute creation, or from the predominance of the organ of destructiveness, find a certain pleasure in killing a hare, or any vermin which it is forbidden them to kill. The carnifex animus will occasionally break out, and offenders will be mulcted, especially till the right of property in game be clearly understood. But poaching, the sport, is quite insignificant compared with poaching, the trade,—insignificant in its effects on game, insignificant in its effects on morals.

It is well known to those who are versed in quarter sessions' practice, that complicated as the Game Laws are, and multifarious as are the penalties which they create, the great majority of the convictions takes place under one statute, the 57th Geo. 3, c. 90, which declares that if any person having entered any open or enclosed ground (a pretty large description) with the intent illegally to take or kill game or rabbits, shall be found at night, armed with any gun, bludgeon, or offensive weapon, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be sentenced to transportation for seven years, or such other punishment as may be inflicted on persons guilty of misdemeanour. It is obvious, from the description of this offence—from its frequency, notwithstanding the heavy punishment denounced against it—that the temptation which urges the peasantry to its commission, must be very different from the mere love of sport, which leads to the other violations of the Game Laws. Nothing, in fact, can account for the prevalence of it among men who do not wage indiscriminate war against society, but very strong pecuniary temptation, combined with very unsettled notions as to the rights which they violate.

It would be unreasonable to expect that uneducated men should entertain a high opinion of the inviolability of game under the present laws. They see that the property in it, is not in the person to whom the rest of the produce of the soil belongs, and out of the result of whose industry the game is fed. They see that the laws made for the preservation of game are daily violated by the wealthy. They find in the yeomen, their immediate superiors, a strong aversion to the pretensions of the privileged class, to whose amusement the game is, by law, dedicated. On the other hand, they find this property-no-property in great demand among people to whom it can only be supplied by their means; and they see that by taking it from the preserves in which it is stored up, they cannot possibly affect the pecuniary interests, and scarcely lessen the enjoyments of the possessor.

That these considerations have great effect in lessening the reluctance to commit the worst offences against the game laws, must be readily admitted by all who reflect that the actual teachers of the labourers of the country,—the yeomen, their masters, with whom they come in daily contact, are themselves in habitual violation of these very laws. How different would the feelings of a labourer be if, in taking game, he knew he was robbing his employer of a saleable article, instead of being led, perhaps, by that very employer's example to think that there is nothing criminal in the act, that there is no disgrace in being suspected of it, or in being detected by any who cannot contribute to bring him to justice.

It must always be recollected, that the moral sanction, in order to operate upon a man, must be applied by his equals, or by those who are so nearly on an equality with him, as to be in habitual intercourse with him. The morality of classes is distinct, and individuals feel themselves at ease if they conform to the morality of the class in which they move. As among rich landholders a man often escapes censure though he has destroyed a family for the preservation of his game, it is not surprising that among day labourers few should be held in disrepute because they destroy game for the preservation of their family. Neither the one nor the other trenches upon the interest of his class. Game, therefore, by being made exclusively the property of the rich, is taken out of the protection of the poor, and of those who give the tone to the poor. But however poaching as a trade is generated, it is that which is the great evil of the Game Laws. If a blow be given to that, if the nightly assemblages of armed men, the conflicts with keepers, and the regular supplies of the gaoles, the hulks, and the gallows, which arise out of this trade, be put an end to, the mere poaching for sport, and the penalties which fall upon it, would be evils of very little moment, though even to these a measure which would make the occupier of the land the owner of the game, would go far to provide a check.

An objection has been raised to making game saleable, of a kind which shews the opinion which the gentry, for whose pleasure the law exists, must entertain of the sacrifices which are to be made for their gratification. If, they say, game were saleable, gentlemen would not think it worth their while to pursue it: it would become a base occupation to shoot a bird that might be openly bought or sold. Gentlemen would cease to reside in the country, and the country would lose the benefit of their services. This objection involves the assumption that the misery and crime arising out of the Game Laws should be perpetuated, in order to give an artificial value to particular species of sport,—that nightly conflicts, daily demoralization, crowded gaols should continue, in order to swell into unnatural importance certain small birds and beasts, that the country gentlemen may think it worth while to shoot at them. It is difficult to conceive a more detestable assumption, a more flagitious claim: but happily, for the credit of sportsmen, it is not at all borne out by experience. It would be difficult for those who make this objection to tell what distinction to this purpose there is between that which is legally saleable, and that which is actually sold. But if the discrimination of the eldest sons of esquires were so nice as to consider the difference between bargain and sale, de facto et de jure, we have a case in point in woodcocks, which are more eagerly pursued by sportsmen than the half-tamed game of preserves, though they are openly and lawfully exposed during the season at every poulterer's.

In the discussion of Mr. Wortley's measure, considerable stress was laid upon the question whether game should be declared to belong to the proprietor of the land on which it is found, or to the tenant; and this difficulty may again present itself upon any future discussion of the subject. It seems, however, of little consequence how the matter is decided. If the proprietor of the land were also declared proprietor of the game, he might, if he chose, grant it to the tenant, with the other benefits of possession. If the tenant became in ordinary course of law the proprietor of the game, the landlord might, if he chose, deprive him, by special agreement, of this appendage of tenancy. The question really is, whether the game shall be in one case the subject of a special grant, or in the other the subject of a special reservation. In such bargains between landlords and tenants, it would not be wise to interfere, and it is only because we suppose that in the majority of instances landlords would wish to leave the game to their tenants, who can clearly reap the greatest advantages from it at the smallest charge, that we should incline to think it should be declared to belong to the occupier, unless specially reserved.

We think that it is clear that the alteration of the law, proposed by Mr. Wortley, would put an end to the doubts and litigation on the right of sporting, and to the petty disputes on that subject;—that it would put an end to the necessity for the trade of poaching, and materially limit the crimes arising out of it, by furnishing a legal supply of game; by making the property in it better understood; by putting it under the guardianship of owners better able to watch it than the present ones, in cases where it is not preserved; and by supplying, in the case of preserves, the means of meeting the expense of a more careful custody. As to the apprehension which some have expressed, that the permission to sell game would tend to extirpate the breed, we hold it as unlikely as that the traffic in poultry should tend to exterminate the breed of domestic fowls: We have, indeed, a proof to the contrary in France and Flanders, where game though sold in the market is still so plentiful as to be scarcely dearer than poultry. But if it be contended, that the present system of law, with all its attendant evils, be necessary for the preservation of game, it is time to inquire whether game be worth preserving at such a price? It is necessary to ask ourselves what particular reason there can be for preserving a property, the existence of which is attended with so vast a quantity of human misery? Upon the supposition that the existing laws are enforced, game possesses no sort of exchangeable value. As an article of food its merit is unquestionable; but there is no one so entirely devoted to the pleasures of the table, as to be willing, in order to secure one, out of the many articles of luxury which are within the reach of the rich, to uphold a system to which thousands of men are annually victims. It is to be remembered too, that no system of law could hinder the rearing of game as an article of domestic luxury; least of all that system of law which would make it freely saleable; and that, at present, over and above the expense of the laws, the mode of preserving game is extremely expensive to the owners.

As, however, the end of all property is enjoyment, the enjoyment procured by the means of game in the shape of sport, is, so far as it goes, as much entitled to our consideration, as the increase of wealth or of food. But as the pursuit and not the acquisition of game is really the object of sportsmen, it is quite absurd to suppose, that, in the disappearance of this or that particular species of animals, the human mind would be brought to the end of all possible amusement, and the country deprived of the services of a resident gentry. Fox-hunting supplies a ready resource, with this merit, that it is more social, and affords out of the same animal suffering an infinitely greater quantity of human enjoyment. It is difficult to weigh the misery of the poor against the enjoyments of the rich; but if the particular sport of partridge shooting cannot be preserved, except at the expense of 1,200 committals a year, it is not impious to wish that shooters were driven to change their mode of amusement. Whist is perhaps as intense a source of delight, to as great a number, as partridge shooting; but if it were the cause of 1,200 committals a year, it would not be too much to entreat the professors of it to play quadrille.

There are two arguments which are perhaps worth noticing. They were brought forward distinctly on some former occasion, by Mr. Lockhart (the member for Oxford), and they seem to have been referred to by some who took part in the last debate. It is urged, that there is no end to the concessions to lawless people, if the numerousness of those who violate the law be made a reason for its alteration; that the Game Laws are not the cause of crime, but its particular outlet at present, the stoppage of which would only drive offenders to some other crime.

We demur to the principle of morality, involved in the first of these objections; and we must deny that the fact alleged, is in any way warranted by experience. The principle is, that because violators of the law are entirely unworthy of sympathy, that their sufferings are not to be taken into the estimate of its effects. Upon this principle no law would be bad, for the miseries its penalties produced would count for nothing. Offenders are devils, whom the law creates to subject in any number to any degree of torment. We contend, however, that it is only by the comparison of good and evil that a law can be judged of, and that into this estimate the suffering of the offender must enter, as a part of the sum; that it is only for the sake of a greater pleasure that pain should be inflicted. This is happily the doctrine upon which the civilized world agrees that the law ought to be founded, and immense as the moral and intellectual difference is between esquires and poachers, we must take into our account the groans of the one as well as the gladness of the other.

We deny, too, that experience warrants us in concluding, that there is a certain quantity of the matter of crime in the world which must find a vent in equal quantities, whatever may be the state of the law. One crime is not the substitute for, it is oftener the cause of another. There are many crimes, indeed, which arise out of the immorality or want of the people. There are others which are really created by the laws. Such are the crimes connected with smuggling; such are the crimes connected with the supply of game to those who by law are not allowed to have it, who by custom are obliged to have it, and who do get it without shame or stint. Now the Game Laws are peculiarly calculated to entice people into the career of crime. In the first place, the game is taken out of the hands of its natural protectors, and the whole opinion of society is set against obedience to the law. In such a state of moral feeling, the penalties are too unfrequently levied, to operate as a powerful check, and are perhaps, on that account, made severe enough, where they fall, to destroy the fortune of the poor man, or to make him the inmate of a gaol. Next, when he is thus far disgraced, the demand for game, and the prohibition of the sale of it by the proprietors, offering him the means of subsisting by the continued violation of the law, and last of all, the manner in which this illegal trade is pursued—in the night by bands of armed men,—prepares him for the commission of other crimes. The penalties which are inflicted for the lesser violation of the game laws are the balloting, by which the conscripts are supplied for the regular soldiery of poachers. This we should expect to be the fact, and there is abundant evidence to prove, that there are many persons who engage in the trade of poaching, who never would have engaged in any of the ordinary crimes against property. In the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1823, a detail was given of the detection of two gangs of poachers of the most desperate kind. Of these, one had killed a man in a pitched battle with the keepers on the Berkeley estate; the other had fought with, and beaten severely Lord Howe's keeper. In both these cases, people much above the thieving level, were engaged with the poachers; farmers, shopkeepers, an attorney, or attorney's clerk. It may be said, that even an attorney may be sometimes a thief. But there are never villages of petty larcenars. In one of these cases, according to the testimony of the police officer, Bishop, who apprehended the offenders, the whole of the village from which they were taken, were poachers. It needs little reasoning to prove, that to produce such phenomena, either the law must be bad, or the moral education of the people detestable.

We shall say a few words on the bill proposed for the declaration of the law on the subject of spring-guns, and of the act which passed to make the stealing of growing produce felony.

The practice of setting spring-guns and other engines, calculated to inflict injury on trespassers, seems to have arisen out of the state of the law which denied to growing produce any other protection than that which was to be found in an action of trespass. As the law stood before the last session, to take away windfalls from under an apple-tree was felony, but to strip the tree itself of all its fruit was merely a trespass. No matter within what sort of inclosure, no matter at what expense fruit or vegetables might be produced, so they were not severed, they were a part of the freehold, and the taking away a part of a freehold was a trespass only. The trespassers, however, who were in the habit of taking liberties with their neighbours' apple-trees and cabbages, were generally people whom a homely proverb declares that it is unwise to sue*. It was natural enough, therefore, for gardeners and others to wish to change their relation towards persons who would be as little dangerous as plaintiffs, as they would be unprofitable as defendants. This led to the practice of setting spring-guns and other engines of the same sort in gardens. There is no doubt, however, that though it arose out of a defect of the law, that the use of these engines was quite unjustifiable. If by the law which enabled the planter of a cabbage to call himself the owner thereof, the stealer of the same vegetable was only to be assailed by a civil action, there was not the slightest justification for laying a train to shoot the should-be defendant in the posterior, or to lacerate the calves of his legs. There was this mitigation, however, in the case of gardens, that the spring-guns could scarcely ever take effect, except upon the persons for whom they were intended. Game preservers, however, who think every thing lawful, and who had not the same pretences as the possessors of gardens, since their property was protected by all sorts of adequate and over-adequate, and summary and anticipative penalties, took to the setting of these engines in places where they were likely to shoot their labourers and servants, and friends, and children, and innocent strangers, as well as those who deserved shooting in the first and second degree; themselves and the poachers. It is obvious, that if an esquire has no right to say, "I will shoot the first trespasser who walks up this path," he is just as little justified in saying, "I will shoot the first man who walks up this path without inquiring whether he is a trespasser or not." If it be unlawful to act upon either of these resolutions in his proper person—of which we presume no one doubts—we can see no other difference in the case of the spring-gun, except indeed that in want of discriminating power it is superior to any esquire.

When the bill declaring it unlawful to set spring-guns, except in enclosed gardens or orchards, was brought into the House of Lords by Lord Suffield, the Duke of Wellington proposed to omit the exceptions, and on being called upon to explain his motive for such a proposal, admitted that his object was to defeat the bill altogether†.

This manœuvre, however, induced Lord Suffield to introduce a bill to make the stealing of unsevered produce felony, that is to say, punishable in the same way as the stealing of severed produce. This bill passed through both houses without any opposition or remark, though the bill which prohibited the setting

The numerous convictions under the new Felony Act have turned public attention to that measure. Nothing seems, on general principles, more reasonable than that the stealing of an apple growing on a tree should be placed in the same scale of crime as the stealing of an apple lying under a tree. The distinction which made the one a felony, the other a trespass, was technical, and in the highest degree absurd. Upon the same principle (that the taking away any part of a freehold is not felony but trespass) the man who clandestinely took the whole of the lead off the roof of another's house could formerly* be prosecuted, if he were discovered, only by action, as for a civil injury; though if, instead of the roof itself, he took any trifling article of property lying upon it, he would have been punishable as a thief. And even now, though to steal a key out of a door is a clear felony, we doubt whether to steal the door off its hinges be any offence. But, in making a new class of offences, some pains should have been taken in apportioning the punishment, so that public opinion should not revolt at the application of it. There are many cases in which thefts in gardens and orchards are boyish frolics, and would be, according to the prevailing opinion, far too severely punished by the mere committal for trial. It may be said, that public opinion in this respect ought to be changed; but that change is not likely to be effected by a law, the execution of which would bring more odium on the prosecutor than on the delinquent. Under the French code, the stealing of fruit for the purpose of eating it on the spot is punishable only by a fine of a few francs; and the punishment is quite sufficient. Some provision of this kind should have been introduced into Lord Suffield's bill; and, perhaps, in all cases where the property stolen is of small value, a fine, payable to the owner upon summary conviction, would be much more likely to be inflicted, and, therefore, more effectual than a severer punishment. Of all the instances of disproportion between offences and penalties, none are so injurious to the due execution of the law as those in which infamizing punishments are denounced against persons habitually considered as scarcely criminal. The unpopularity of the measure is therefore not to be wondered at, though, with slight modifications, it might have been both popular and useful.

But the act, like almost every penal law that has resulted from the desultory and unsystematic legislation of the framers of the statute book, while it is too indiscriminating, is not comprehensive. The proper remedy for the defect of the law would have been to have taken away, as far as the crime of larceny was concerned, the absurd distinction of real and personal, not only as it regards growing produce, but as it regards every other species of property that is liable to be the subject of depredation.

But whatever are the defects in this act, it takes away the only pretence for the toleration of spring-guns; we cannot say their lawfulness; for no one, not excepting the judges, seems to know whether they have been lawful or not.

The rejection of the bill for settling the law on this subject affords a singular example of the feelings of the majority of the Legislature on the subject of jurisprudence. Though the law on this head is notoriously doubtful—though the judges have delivered conflicting opinions on it, and though these circumstances were brought under the notice of Parliament, yet the House of Commons preferred this state of uncertainty to any distinct legislation on the subject. The bill, which may be considered a declaratory one, passed through that House of Parliament, which, besides forming a part of the Legislature, is the highest court of appeal. The opinion of the greatest judicial body of the kingdom is thus given in favour of one interpretation of the law, while the House of Commons reject this interpretation without proposing or attempting to frame any other.

CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT.

Unitarians' Marriage Bill.

THE question, whether it be right and safe to tolerate the Unitarians, has been already decided by the Legislature. They have been declared worthy of the degree of protection and liberty which is conceded to other dissenters. An end has been put to their direct exclusion from the benefits of the Toleration Act. But the indirect exclusion still operates, and renders their toleration incomplete. They may worship God according to the dictates of their consciences; but on one of the most important and interesting occasions which human life presents, they must also worship, or seem to worship God, in a manner inconsistent with those dictates. Religious liberty is not less violated by the enforcement of Trinitarian, than it would be by the prohibition of Unitarian worship.

* The stealing of lead, and in some instances produce, was made criminal by statutes of the last century.

It is generally thought desirable that some religious observance should solemnize an entrance upon the matrimonial state. To this the Unitarians do not object. But whatever good effects are contemplated in a religious ceremony must be contingent on the conviction of the parties who perform that ceremony. The members of the Church of England, and even those dissenters who agree with them in doctrines, may be much edified by the service as it now stands. But a compulsory assent to propositions which are disbelieved, produces no edification. It is an act of hypocrisy, and depraves the moral sense, or it engenders irritation and leads to brawling. The house of prayer becomes the arena of theological conflict, and moral utility is the last result which can be anticipated under such circumstances. If any force can be added to the obligation of the matrimonial contract, if public good of any kind can be produced by associating religious sanctions with that contract, they must at least be the sanctions of a religion which the persons contracting hold in reverence.

The prelates of the church of England are accustomed to speak of marriage as a divine institution; but the law has recognized it merely as a civil contract. During the protectorate, parties proposing to marry, presented themselves, not to the clergyman, but to the magistrate. They were content with the benediction of a justice of the peace; and, after the restoration, these unions were declared to be as valid as if they had been celebrated according to the established ritual. Blackstone says expressly, that "our law considers marriage in no other light than as a civil contract." But, assuming that it is a divine institution, assuredly divine authority cannot be pleaded for any particular form of solemnization.

No directions exist on that subject, either in the laws of Moses or the precepts of Christianity. The divinity of the institution cannot be plainer than that the mode of its celebration was altogether left to the choice and consciences of individuals. This freedom was only terminated by the usurpations of the Romish hierarchy; and Pope Innocent III. about the commencement of the thirteenth century, was the first who ordained the celebration of marriage in the church. The utmost, therefore, for which any Protestant ecclesiastic can consistently contend is, that some religious ceremony is essential to the marriage union; not that the ceremony adopted by his church is so. His authorities go no further. Whether that ceremony should be imposed is a question of expediency, not of conscience, and must be decided on the ground of public utility.

On this ground, it is not difficult to dispose of the objections which were urged against the Unitarian Dissenters' Marriage bill, and which ultimately occasioned its rejection.

The most important objection is, that the bill would revive those facilities for effecting clandestine marriages, to destroy which was the great object of Lord Hardwicke's act. This objection seems to have been anticipated by the applicants, and was precluded by the first measure introduced on their behalf by Mr. W. Smith, in the session of 1819. The plan then proposed was, that on the production of a written declaration that the parties were Unitarian Dissenters, the clergyman should omit that portion of the service in which an act of Trinitarian worship is performed. This single alteration would have satisfied the petitioners. It would have left all things else connected with the subject, by law or custom, precisely as they now are. But it was found to be so offensive to the clergy, that the plan was abandoned. According to the present bill, the marriage was to be solemnized in the Unitarian chapel, but all the existing regulations of prevention and security, as the mode of obtaining licenses, the proclamation of banns, and the record in the parochial register (the clergyman of the parish having previous notice of the solemnization, and the parties attending on the same day, with a certificate of its having taken place) were to be preserved. As additional precautions, it was provided, that the chapel should have been registered for worship twelve months previously; that it should be specially registered for the celebration of marriages; that notice of such registration should be placed in some conspicuous part of the interior; that the number of chapels to be so registered, should be limited to six, within the bills of mortality; two in each of the following towns, Bristol, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Leeds; one in every other city and market town; and that in no other part of England or Wales, should there be any chapel entitled to registration within six miles of any other previously registered; that the Minister should also be specially registered in the Ecclesiastical Court; that the performance of marriage by any minister not duly qualified, or not according to the provisions of the act, should be felony; and that all marriages celebrated without licence, or publication of banns, or in an unregistered chapel, should be null and void. It was also provided, that, in giving notice to the clergyman of the intended marriage, the same fees should be paid to him, as are at present paid for actually solemnizing it; thus securing to the Established Church, untouched, all that it now possesses of power and emolument.

It seems, however, difficult to concert a scheme which will not be encountered by some scruples on behalf of the Clergy. It was alleged that they could not, conscientiously, become registrars of marriages celebrated in chapels at once Dissenting and Unitarian. The petitioners have to meet this difficulty, on their next application, by the establishment of some office of registration of their own.

Another objection urged by Mr. Peel, was, "that if every man in society were "allowed to select the individual by "whom he should be married, the marriage vow would not be observed with "that sanctity with which it was at present." Yet Dissenters are in full possession of this right both in Ireland and Scotland; and while the average of matrimonial morality is not below that of England in the one country, in the other it is generally allowed to be superior. The Unitarians must have very singular notions of obligation, if they can be made to feel more deeply the sanctity of a vow, by being compelled to take it in names, to which they ascribe no attribute of Divinity.

Mr. Peel seemed to think too, that there had been forty or fifty years of silent acquiescence on the part of the Unitarians, and that they had no more reason to complain, than other Protestant dissenters. With respect to the supposed acquiescence, so long as the penal statutes against denying the doctrine of the Trinity remained in force, it is obvious, that no application for relief from a Trinitarian ceremony, could have been entertained by the legislature; and it was not likely that such an application should be made, which of itself would have been a confession sufficient to subject the applicant to a penalty. These penalties were not abolished till the year 1813; in 1814, the Unitarians protested in the churches; in 1816, or 1817, they petitioned the legislature for relief; and in 1819, Mr. William Smith introduced a bill, which, had it passed, would have removed the grievance. With respect to the other Protestant dissenters, they are all Trinitarians, and as such, feel no repugnance to the marriage ceremony of the Church of England; or so little as not to have esteemed it worth while to engage in any contest on the subject with the ecclesiastical courts; for in the courts of common law, Lord C. J. Holt seems to have held their marriages valid, and at the present day, the marriages of Jews and Quakers stand on no surer foundation. The marriages of persons belonging to those sects, are indeed exempted from the regulations prescribed by Lord Hardwicke's act †. But this exception does not of itself legalize them; it only confirmed the validity which they previously possessed, which differed in nothing from that of the marriages of other non-conformists.

But it has been urged, that if the members of this sect be allowed to marry in their own way, so also must the members of all other sects. The argument assumes, that the cases are similar, and that the consequence would be an evil. Now the cases are not similar. The difference has been already pointed out. Other sects agree with the establishment in its Trinitarian faith. They can join in its worship; the Unitarian cannot: the mischief of his being allowed to adopt a form more accordant with his creed, under precautions similar to those which are contemplated in the present case, is not to be easily discovered, and ought at least to be specifically pointed out by those who make the objection.

PUBLIC HEALTH.

Quarantine Laws.

THE inconvenience occasioned by the operation of the Quarantine laws, has produced, in many quarters, a demand for the modification or revision of them; but before we can determine the expediency of any considerable alteration of these laws, we ought to ascertain, with precision, whether they do or do not prevent evils much greater in amount than the inconveniences they occasion. In a word, whether there is any foundation for the opinion on which these laws are founded, that the Plague, Typhous fever, and certain other diseases, are propagated by contagion.

We may state briefly then, that up to a comparatively recent period, the prevailing opinions on the subject of contagion were nearly as follows, viz.: That certain diseases, such as Plague, Typhous fever, and Scarlatina, as well as Small-pox, Measles, Hooping-cough, and some others, are communicable by contact with the diseased patient,—by the effluvia exhaled from his body,—and by his breath or saliva:—That certain clothes, particularly of woollen or cotton, if long placed in juxtaposition, or contact, with the patient, have the property of becoming thereby so affected as afterwards to communicate the disease at almost any distance of place or time; and that by this means, in particular, the Small-pox and Typhous fever have been disseminated, in various parts of the globe, by European ships, the crews of which had no such disease among them:—That the activity of the animal poison, as communicable in any of the ways above-mentioned, or in other words, the susceptibility of the human frame to be affected by it, varies considerably in different individuals, and at different times. Of the causes of these variations nothing is known; but it has been observed that in certain states of the atmosphere, and during certain winds, the progress of contagious diseases is checked, if not altogether suspended; as in cold dry weather;—and that in certain other states of the atmosphere, as in a hot and humid temperature, their progress is unusually rapid and fatal: It has been also observed, that these diseases seldom attack the same person twice: which circumstance, by diminishing the number of persons liable to attack,—and the variations of the atmosphere, by lowering the degree of susceptibility,—have been thought to afford a sufficient explanation of the occasionally sudden suspension or cessation of these contagious diseases; while the retention of the infectious matter, or fomites, in clothes of various kinds, and, the transmission of the disease under every impediment to a few highly susceptible temperaments, are supposed to account for their periodical reappearance, whenever the state of the atmosphere, and the combination of circumstances, is favourable to its diffusion.

The attention of the medical world, and of the public at large, has been lately drawn to a renewed attempt to overthrow the received doctrine of contagion, as it applies to certain diseases generally reputed contagious, and more particularly to the plague, typhous fever, and scarlatina. This opinion seems to have taken its rise in America, during the discussions on the subject of the yellow fever, more particularly those respecting its contagious nature. Dr. Bayley, of New York, in his account of the yellow fever, prevalent in that city in 1795, maintained that it was not contagious, and extended the same theory to other epidemics. The same doctrine was afterwards adopted and illustrated by Dr. Millar*, and other American physicians. In this country, its chief advocates have been Dr. Adams† and Dr. Maclean‡. We shall proceed to give the outline of their theory, and of the arguments they have advanced in its support.

In order to understand this theory, it is necessary to keep in view the distinctions on which they found it; and the meaning they have affixed to certain terms.

They begin by dividing diseases into three classes; namely, contagious, epidemic, and sporadic diseases§.

To the first division, or that of contagious diseases, belong, as the name imports, all diseases which are capable of being communicated from person to person. They are either general or local. As belonging to the former class, Dr. Maclean specifies small-pox and measles: as examples of the latter, he points out syphilis and the itch*.

An epidemic disease is defined by some writers to be a disease which is not capable of being propagated by contagion; but which, at certain periods, prevails generally over the whole, or over a large portion of a community. "It comprehends "all the intermediate degrees of affection, "between the slightest catarrh, and the "most destructive pestilence†."

A sporadic disease, is a disease which arises either in a single instance only, or of which the cases at one time are few and scattered: this division comprehends, therefore, all the affections which are not included under the two former divisions.

They hold that it is only the small number of diseases comprehended under the first class of the first division, in this new classification (that is, general contagious diseases), that are communicable from person to person, through the medium of the atmosphere. With regard to these diseases, they adopt the common theory; that is, they admit that a specific animal poison is reproduced in each patient in whom the disease takes place, and that it is transmitted and applied to the person who subsequently becomes infected. It is to be observed, that the catalogue of diseases in which they admit this operation of contagion by effluvia, is rather short. Dr. Maclean enumerates only two, namely, small-pox and measles. Dr. Adams joins with these scarlatina, which Dr. Maclean expressly excludes from this class.

There can be no difficulty, they say, in distinguishing diseases of this class; because "diseases, which are produced by "a specific contagion, have never been "known to depend upon any other‡: and "because contagion, in its operation on the "human body, observes certain fixed laws. "A knowledge of these laws is essential "to the understanding of this subject§."

They are stated to be as follows:—

* Maclean, Result, &c. i. 158.

† Ibid. i. 148.

‡ Ibid. i. 161.

§ Westminster Review, iii, 139. The outline of the doctrine concerning the laws of epidemics and contagious diseases, is abridged from the account given in that article, p. 139, et seq.

1. Contagious diseases produce certain phenomena; that is, a combination of certain symptoms, which symptoms are determinate and uniform, never varying, except in degrees. Each disease, under every variety of circumstance, preserves the same specific character.

2. The phenomena produced by contagious diseases are not only determinate in themselves, but they are uniform in their progress, and in their termination. The order and succession of symptoms are constant, and the periods of their different stages are fixed and invariable.

3. The morbid matter producing a contagious disease, being once secreted, that disease can be propagated at any time, and amongst any number of persons, by this specific virus: and these effects can be produced by no other cause. From this law it follows that no disease which is not contagious at its commencement, can become contagious in its progress.

4. General or acute contagious diseases are incapable of affecting the same person more than once in the course of his life. This is considered as a peculiar and distinguishing law of general contagious diseases: and it is a circumstance which sets boundaries to infection, and could alone, when no precautions are taken, prevent communities from being extinguished.

Epidemic diseases are said to present a perfect contrast to general contagious diseases. They are governed by laws equally precise and uniform; but these laws are just the reverse of those of contagious diseases. For instance, the phenomena of epidemic diseases, instead of being determinate and uniform, are diversified in the highest degree, observe no regular course, and their duration is variable. On the other hand, the periods at which they commence, decline, and cease, are determinate, and exact; and these periods correspond with certain states of the seasons. They differ in different countries according to their geographical position, and they may be anticipated or postponed by circumstances, but in general they are remarkably uniform. They are capable of affecting the same persons repeatedly, and in general, relapses are so frequent and so fatal, that they may be ranked among the chief causes of the excessive mortality of epidemic diseases.

As the classification of diseases into contagious, epidemic, and sporadic, is intended to comprehend all diseases; it follows that every disease must find a place in one or other of these classes.

If it be a general disease, that is, a disease affecting great numbers in one place, and at one time, it must belong to the class either of contagious, or epidemic. With the exception, therefore, of the small number which are admitted to compose the former class (that is, with the exception of small-pox and measles), all diseases hitherto reputed contagious through the medium of the air, such as typhus, plague, and scarlatina*, must, according to the theory we are considering, be held to belong to the class of epidemics, and of course to be incapable of being communicated by contagion. Dr. Maclean, indeed, acknowledges, that he employs the terms epidemic diseases, pestilential diseases, and plague, as synonymous†. The following extract from his work will also shew what are his views, with regard to the distinctions usually drawn in these diseases.

"Plague, which comprehends every variety and degree of affection common to this class of maladies, may be aptly regarded as the representative of the whole. The yellow fever of the West Indies and of America, the fevers of Bengal, Batavia, Bencoolen, Bulam, Cadix, Gibraltar, Andalusia, Malta, Walcheren, Leghorn, &c., &c., as well as every variety of remittent and intermittent fever, will all be found to be only modifications of one and the same disease, produced by modifications of the same cause, and yielding to modifications of the same remedies."

That any of the above mentioned diseases can be contagious, is denied on the following grounds:—

First, because they do not in their origin, progress, and termination observe those laws, which have been laid down as characteristic of contagion: Secondly, because the facts on which the doctrine of their being contagious rests, may be more satisfactorily explained in another manner.

The views entertained of the origin and nature of epidemics, then, are next to be stated.

"The cause of an epidemic disease is, or rather is supposed to be, a certain condition of the air.—An epidemic disease prevails through the influence of the atmosphere.—For the extension of an epidemic disease, it is only necessary that a person (provided he be disposed to receive the maulady) be surrounded by the noxious air from which the epidemic arises§. This hypothesis affords the best solution of all the phenomena which they exhibit. What that constitution of the atmosphere is, which gives rise, in any case, to an epidemic disease, we do not know; therefore we cannot know what the peculiar constitution of that atmosphere is, which gives rise to peculiar epidemics. Of both these points we are in total ignorance. It is reasonable to believe, that there are certain qualities of the atmosphere which have a considerable influence in the generation of these diseases; namely, its heat, cold, moisture, dryness, and electrical state; but what degrees and combinations of these qualities are connected with the production of epidemic diseases, we do not know. We have derived, from experience, the certain knowledge of one fact only; namely, that these maladies are generated most frequently, and in the most malignant forms, by a moist and warm atmosphere. It has, moreover, been supposed, that certain changes may take place in the constitution of the air which are not perceptible to our senses, and that these changes may have the most important influence on human health and life. Of this conjecture it is impossible to affirm or deny any thing; the changes it supposes, even if they really take place, must for ever remain unknown to us||. The air, it is certain, is often charged with noxious exhalations, arising from the putrefaction of animal and vegetable matter. These exhalations are generated in marshy situations, or where stagnant water contains dead vegetable matter, and their production is greatly promoted by heat. Their precise nature is not known, for they have never been obtained in a separate state; but it is ascertained, that they are suspended in the air; that naturally they do not extend far beyond the places where they are generated; that, by currents of wind, they are capable of being conveyed to a great distance; that they exert a powerful agency in producing some of the most malignant fevers¶.—"Epidemic diseases," says Dr. Maclean, "in all countries, both cultivated and uncultivated, occur in some districts, in some towns of the same district, in some quarters of the same town, in some streets of the same quarter, in some houses of the same street, in some rooms of the same house, and even in some corners of the same room, more frequently than in others. Of the districts,—the worst cultivated, the most woody, the most exposed to particular winds, to scarcity, to inundation, &c.; of the towns,—those which are situated on the sea-coast, and are low, damp, and unprotected from certain winds; and of the streets, houses, and apartments,—those which are, in the respects mentioned, the farthest from salubrity, and the worst built, and occupied by the poorest inhabitants, are the most subject to visitations of disease**."

Dr. Maclean uses no term to designate this noxious state of the atmosphere, which they conceive to be the immediate source of all epidemic diseases. But as the term Malaria is generally used in a sense which perfectly coincides with their notion of this condition of the atmosphere, we shall, for the sake of avoiding circumlocution, employ it to express this supposed aerial origin of epidemic diseases, according to the theory of Dr. Maclean.

The influence of malaria is supposed to be frequently directed to particular situations by the agency of the winds; and hence the greater insalubrity of some parts of the same town or district, and the apparently capricious locality of its operation. Its activity is promoted by confined air, filth, and crowded habitations. Exposure to the inclemencies and vicissitudes of the weather, to cold, wet, and fatigue; to putrid animal or vegetable exhalations; scarcity of food, mental depression, and above all, the fear of contagion, are stated to be among the chief causes which give a predisposition to be affected by malaria. In this way they account for the greater prevalence of epidemics among the poorer classes, with whom so many of these predisposing causes operate to the fullest extent.

The hypothesis of malaria, combined with that of predisposition induced by the above causes, is alleged to be fully adequate to account for all the phenomena of epidemic diseases, without the aid of the principle of contagion. The existence of such a principle, therefore, in any general disease (except in small-pox and measles), is denied by Dr. Maclean, in opposition to all the facts of apparent communication of disease, either by contact with the patient, or vicinity to his person, or contact with substances capable of imbibing and retaining the effluvia which may arise from his body. All these facts he considers as merely casual or accidental coincidences; the illness of one individual having no real influence on, or connexion with that of another. If a person in health visit a sick man, and soon after is himself attacked with the very same disease, this, he alleges, however frequent an occurrence, yet never can amount to a proof that the one event was the cause of the other; because, it is equally possible that the illness of both persons was the effect of some common cause, to which they were both exposed, within a short interval of time. "If you and I are exposed to the rain," observed Dr. Radcliffe, facetiously, upon being asked his opinion respecting contagion, as applied to epidemic maladies, "we shall both get wet; but it does not follow that we shall wet one another*." Dr. Maclean contends that exposure to a common cause takes place in every instance of alleged contagion, and that therefore, the introduction of this cause is unnecessary for the explanation of the phenomenon. If it be unnecessary, there is no proof of the existence of contagion.

But further it is said, that not only is the doctrine of contagion unsupported by positive proof, but that it is absolutely disproved by many facts which are inconsistent with its truth. It is alleged first, that innumerable instances may be produced, of persons communicating with patients in all stages of epidemic disorders, such as typhus, and the plague, without such communication being followed by any attack of disease, and that the clothes of those who have died of the plague are worn by the survivors without ill effect, and purchased in the market without hesitation. If these diseases had really been contagious, it would have been impossible for such persons to have escaped infection. Secondly, the duration of an epidemic disease in a particular town or country extends only for a certain period; sooner or later its ravages are mitigated; it ceases to spread, and at length totally disappears. Such a course is irreconcilable with that which would mark the progress of a contagious disease. Contagion, once generated in sufficient quantity, would spread in every direction where social intercourse existed; no limit would confine it; no person would escape its infection; it would overcome all obstacles, overspread the world, and never relax in its course of devastation until it had exterminated mankind. "Epidemics are not contagious, because the human race continues to exist†."

Thirdly, if epidemic diseases depended upon contagion, all persons would alike be liable to contract them. "Contagion being applied, disease would as readily seize the rich as the poor, the well-fed as the ill-fed; the well-clothed as the ill-clothed; the well-lodged as the ill-lodged; the idle as the laborious; those who dwell in a pure, as those who dwell in an impure atmosphere‡."

† Westminster Review, iii. 147.

‡ Maclean, i. 272.

Fourthly, epidemic diseases are capable of affecting the same individual more than once; contagious diseases never do; the former, therefore, are not contagious.

"The phenomena and laws of epidemics are dissimilar and opposite to those of contagious diseases. Such diseases must, therefore, be inconvertible and incompatible*."

Fifthly, epidemic diseases sometimes break out in insulated situations, and where no similar disease has, for a length of time, been known to exist. If such disease be afterwards spread by contagion, the contagion must have been generated in the course of the epidemic; for the spontaneous generation of a specific animal poison, is contrary to the ascertained laws of the animal economy. A disease non-contagious in its commencement, cannot become contagious in its progress; nor if once contagious, can it ever cease to be so.

Sixthly, if epidemic diseases were really propagated by contagion, the evidence establishing such a fact would be so clear, so numerous, so overwhelming, as to place it beyond all question: it could not possibly be a matter of controversy. But its truth has been questioned—"this alone must be sufficient to decide the matter in the judgment of every philosophical mind †."

Having given this brief outline of the new theory with regard to epidemic diseases, which is intended to supersede the long established doctrine of contagion; and having stated the principal arguments brought forward in its support, we shall proceed to examine how far they are valid and conclusive.

It is alleged that the supposition of contagion having any share in the production and extension of epidemic diseases is unnecessary, because all the facts are sufficiently explicable by the hypothesis of malaria being the sole cause of these diseases. But to this it may be replied, that malaria, as an agent in the production of disease, is quite as much an hypothesis as that of contagion, for which it is substituted. The matter of contagion cannot be distinguished by the sight, or the touch, or by any of the other senses; nor is its presence to be detected by any physical test. Malaria equally eludes all human scrutiny, and is known only by its effects on the constitutions of those who respire it.

Its origin, its nature, and its physical properties, are confessedly alike unknown. Its operation is noted for its irregularity and capriciousness‡: which is the same as saying, it remains a perfect enigma. It is only by carefully tracing the districts and places where persons are attacked by disease, that its course can be traced, and that it appears to occupy certain situations, and to follow the direction of particular winds. But it is acknowledged, that beyond this, nothing has been ascertained concerning it. Greater facility in explaining facts in the history of epidemics is, therefore, certainly not one of the advantages which the theory of malaria possesses over that of contagion.

Various are the causes, it is said, which contaminate the air, and render it pestiferous, or capable of producing epidemic fevers: and these causes may be reduced to three classes. 1st. The confinement of the healthy exhalations of the human body, as happens, for instance, on board a ship, where the hatches are shut down, during bad weather, and a number of persons kept in confined air between decks, and for a few days. Want of cleanliness will, of course, aggravate this cause of fever. 2ndly. The confinement of morbid exhalations of the human body; as in crowded and imperfectly ventilated hospitals. 3dly. Exhalations arising from the putrefaction of dead animal and vegetable matters. What are called marsh miasmata will rank under this latter head. All these, according to the new theory, constitute a state of atmosphere which generates epidemic diseases, such as agues, remittent fever, typhus, yellow fevers, scarlatina, plague, &c., &c.; for all epidemics are considered as belonging to the same species of disease, and to pass into one another by all sorts of gradations. Now it may be perfectly true, that all the above causes may give occasion to fever, and that still some of these particular kinds of fever may be propagated by contagion. We have already stated, that it is by no means impossible that the contagions of typhus may be generated under such circumstances. The only objection that can be urged against such a supposition is, that it is not accordant with the analogy of other contagions, and that it is at variance with the notions we naturally form of its properties. But analogy, although highly useful in suggesting subjects of inquiry, and although it may strengthen the probability of conclusions, which have already been deduced from actual observation, would perpetually lead us into error, especially in pathology, if we placed any reliance upon it, independently of observation. This caution is more particularly necessary in speculating upon the operations of nature in the animal economy, where she appears, as if purposely, to throw off the restraint of all the laws by which human intelligence presumes to circumscribe her movements. There can be no doubt that each specific contagion must, at one time or other, have had a spontaneous origin. What has once occurred may again happen; and many instances have appeared in modern times of the generation of new species of contagion, and of the extinction of ancient ones. But after all, this supposition of the spontaneous generation of typhous contagion is by no means necessary for the explanation of the facts. The seeds of the contagion may lurk unobserved, and break out at such times only when a particular concurrence of circumstances favours its activity and diffusion. By thus spreading from a new centre, the appearance of having been spontaneously produced will naturally arise. That similar appearances of spontaneous origin frequently occur, with regard both to the itch, and the small-pox, is well known to all medical practitioners of experience: and yet nobody dreams of inferring from such facts, that these diseases are not contagious.

‡ These "noxious qualities of the air," says the Westminster Reviewer, "which may be so partial and so fluctuating, and which may increase or diminish so slowly, or so instantaneously," are capable of "explaining all the phenomena in the most satisfactory manner."—Vol. iii. p. 160.

* Westminster Review, p. 147.

When it is said, that "contagion has hitherto been universally confounded with this corruption of the air:" and that corrupted air, and not contagion, has the power to generate malignant fevers; the essential difference between the effects of these two agents is totally lost sight of. The characteristic property of contagion is that the disease it excites in a person in health is the same with that of the patient who produces the contagion. Let us suppose that a person, in perfect health, were to remain for a certain time, in the surgical wards of an hospital, among patients confined to their beds, by various severe infirmities, such as fractures, abscesses, sloughing and gangrenous sores, or carious bones, many of which taint the whole air of the apartment, with highly offensive effluvia; or let him spend some hours in the still more loathsome atmosphere of the dissecting-room, and he will either escape unhurt, or if any bodily inconvenience ensue, his disorder will not resemble any of those which he has approached. But let us, on the other hand, suppose that he were to remain for an equal time in the wards of an hospital, containing patients ill of typhous fever, scarlatina, or the plague, and we shall even suppose that the air is kept perfectly free from any offensive odour: What is the consequence? It frequently will happen that in a few days after such a visit, he is seized with symptoms of fever, which proves to be of the very same kind with that of the patients he has approached or touched. If mere corruption of air be the causes of these diseases, why was not either of them produced in the instances first referred to, where such corruption existed in its fullest degree; while it was scarcely sensible in the latter? Can we believe that the reproduction of the very same disease, and no other, in the latter instance, is the effect of mere chance? If so, why do we never see typhus in one person, produce scarlatina in another, and vice versa? To say that such reproduction of a disease is not the result of contagion, is to refuse to that term the acceptation in which it is received by the generality of mankind: for the circumstance in question is the essential part of the definition of contagion. To call it corruption, or contamination of the air, or malaria, or to give it any other name, can never alter the nature of the facts; and is only a fruitless effort to draw distinctions where there is no real difference.

That contagion does not produce its specific effects under every variety of circumstances, that persons may be exposed to its influence and yet escape infection, and that all contagious must necessarily proceed, when once generated, until they have brought under their subjection the whole human race, without any discrimination of age, sex, or condition, are perpetually urged by Dr. Maclean and his followers, as arguments against the reality of such an agent as contagion. Such objections are, it is obvious, founded on mistaken views of the nature of contagion: they proceed upon the presumption that its properties and powers are different from what they really are. Instances of persons escaping infection, are no proofs that others have not received it: they shew only that contagion has certain limits, beyond which it ceases to be efficient. Typhus and the plague are in this respect perfectly upon a par with small-pox and measles; many persons liable to these diseases, remain in health, while others, who are exposed in the same circumstances, become infected. Because contagion does not spread beyond a certain point, does it follow that it never spreads at all? Because there are obstacles which it cannot surmount, are we on that account to conclude that it is utterly powerless? Must we not still call arsenic a poison, although a fraction of a grain of it may be swallowed with impunity?

The objection that typhous fever, scarlatina, and plague, cannot be contagious, because they may attack the same persons more than once, is equally futile. It is founded on a vain assumption of our being perfectly acquainted with the operation of all these contagions, from considering the analogy of certain other contagions: when the analogy itself, from which that supposed knowledge is derived, really leads to an inference directly the reverse; for no doubt can now exist, that even small-pox and measles, which are assumed as the prototypes of contagious diseases, are themselves liable to recurrence in the same individual. All the generalization which the subject admits of is this, that every contagious disease which has fairly gone through all its stages, diminishes, and in many cases entirely destroys, the predisposition to a second attack. Different diseases effect this constitutional change in different degrees; the small-pox and measles almost always completely: scarlatina less perfectly: typhus and the plague probably also in an inferior degree: but in none is the security absolute. With regard to contagions which act only by virus, there is no security whatever against a return. Nature in this, as in numberless other instances, presents a gradation of power in a variety of analogous agents. Diseases communicable by contagion appear to compose one family, each, however, marked by features of peculiarity. The true analogy, is therefore in favour of the contagiousness of scarlatina, typhus, and the plague; and this argument is considerably strengthened in the case of the last of these diseases by its eruptive character, which assimilates it with the order of small-pox and measles.

Sufficient has already been said, to shew that the objection founded on the breaking out of epidemics in insulated situations, is of no greater force against the opinion of their being contagions, than it is against that of small-pox or measles being contagious; for the very same thing happens with regard to these latter diseases. There is indeed, scarcely any objection which has been brought forward against the contagion of typhus or the plague, that might not also be urged against that of the small-pox.

It has been alleged, that if the belief in contagion were founded in truth, the proofs of it would ere this time have been so strong and decisive, as to have left no room for doubt. The very existence of doubt on such a subject, is adduced as a proof that the whole theory of contagion is false. But what truth is there that would bear such a test? Narrow indeed would be the circle of human knowledge, if every doctrine that had once been called in question, were to be excluded. In proportion as any proposition is important, we become the more interested in the assurance of its certainty, and solicitous to examine its foundations. The doubts that have been raised on the subject of contagion, far from being proofs of its non-existence, are rather sureties that the subject has, from age to age, undergone discussion and scrutiny: and the doctrine which has stood its ground for ages against opposition, must be esteemed more solid than that which has not been subjected to a similar ordeal. It should also be recollected, that the proofs which daily occur of the infectious nature of a disease, almost universally believed to be contagious, are deemed superfluous, and are therefore neither sought, recorded, nor remembered.

If the authority of medical writers were to be allowed any weight in deciding a question of this nature, the preponderance of testimony in favour of the contagiousness of scarlatina, typhus, and the plague, would be of the most overwhelming kind. But Dr. Maclean's theory is, that the ancients were total strangers to the very idea of a disease being communicated by contagion; and that this notion was an ingenious device of Pope Paul III., who contrived it in the year 1547, as a stratagem to frighten away the Council of Trent and lead them to acquiesce in his secret wish to remove their sittings to Bologna. The very circumstance of the removal of the Council from Trent to Bologna, on the plea of contagion, proves, that a belief in the existence of contagion had previously been general and popular. That a belief in contagion existed from the remotest times of antiquity, is incontrovertibly proved by a host of passages from the historians and philosophers of those times, and also from the sacred writings. Thucydides, Aristotle, Galen, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Livy, Appian, Eusebius, Evagrius, Procopius, Cedrenus, Aretæus, Lucretius, Ovid, Coelius Aurelianus, among the ancient writers; and Muratori, Marsellus Ficinus, Forti, and Alexander Benedict, between the time of the revival of learning, and the date of the Council of Trent, all distinctly speak of diseases communicated from one person to another. The evidence on this point collected by various writers*, is quite irresistible.

If the prevalence of the belief in contagion, were to be ascribed solely to a fondness in the public for the marvellous, and a disposition to cherish and propagate an opinion, which involved the action of so mysterious an agent as contagion; we should expect that the same notion would have been extended to agues and remittent fevers. But this has not happened, "No such controversy," observes Sir Gilbert Blane, "has arisen regarding the intermittent fevers of the fens of Lincolnshire, and the marshes of Zealand, which are universally admitted to be endemic, and non-contagious†."

But reasonings on the origin of opinions, are little to the purpose, when compared with the direct evidence of facts. If we can obtain positive instances of epidemic diseases being communicated by contagion, that question will be set at rest; and all the hypothetical arguments to the contrary will fade into insignificance, and vanish before the steady light of actual experience. Now the facts are these. Examples without number may be produced, where every member of a family has been affected in succession with typhous fever, in consequence of too frequent and careless intercourse of those who were well, with those who were sick. In proportion as precautions are used to restrain such intercourse within certain bounds, the numbers thus affected diminish: and if strict care be taken to prevent all communication, the disease does not spread; or if it does, it spreads only to the immediate attendants of the sick. But even in cases where careful ventilation, and constant changes of linen have prevented immediate infection; the linen, the bed-clothes, and the furniture of the room, retain a portion of the poison; and persons using them have been seized with the disease. Innumerable instances also occur of persons catching typhus, from visiting, or otherwise being exposed to the atmosphere surrounding such persons, although in a different, and even remote habitation from their own: and, therefore, not permanently under the influence of the same circumstances in which the patient is placed. Now, one of two things must be true, either the illness of the person first attacked, had some connexion with the illness of the second, (which is the doctrine of contagion,) or the illness of both was owing to a general cause, which, by a singular conjunction, happened to affect these two persons in succession, without the circumstance of their having approached each other having any share in the production of disease. A single instance of such conjunction of events, it is true, could not sanction any inference in favour of contagion. But the occurrence of a second and a third, would strengthen the probability of the action of such a cause. A great number of such coincidences in the same epidemic, such as would form a large proportion of the whole number of cases, would bring it to a moral certainty.

"If typhous were not contagious," says Dr. Stokes, "we would expect that when it is prevalent, it should occur in different families indiscriminately. If, on the contrary, it were contagious, we should expect that more individuals would be seized in those families where it had already appeared, than in others, and this is what has been observed in Dublin, as well as in other cities of the United Kingdom. It may be stated as a well established general observation, that typhous runs through families. The physicians who have practised extensively among the poor, have observed that this disease sometimes affects every individual of a family, in which it appears, frequently the majority, and often produces one or more relapses in several of the family.—There is a certain degree of grouping of disease, which cannot be fairly referred to mere casualty, and this assertion depends on the same principles of the doctrine of chances, as those which prove, that the odds against throwing the same cast of the dice many times successively, are enormous*."

In the fever which prevailed at Dublin a few years ago, in a family consisting of twelve, eleven out of the twelve were attacked in succession with the disease. "In the general course of the epidemic, in the district in which this family resided, one out of seven took the fever. Had the family consisted of fourteen, it might have been said, before the epidemic, that if two of that family sickened, they have only the average share of the general calamity; in the family of twelve, the sickening of two would have been more than their average share, and the sickening of eleven so much more, that the chance against that event would have been nearly 189,600,000 to 1†."

The hypothesis of malaria, will not account for the fact, that patients who have contracted fever in one situation, after being removed to another and perfectly healthy situation, still communicate the disease to others. Such facts are completely inconsistent with the whole theory of the non-contagionists, that they have no resource left but boldly to deny them. Yet there can be no doubt, that fever occasionally spreads among the patients of the same hospital, and that it is communicated to the nurses and medical attendants. We find it introduced into a family by a visitor, who happens to have the fever upon him, or who brings infection in his clothes. We find it distinctly conveyed by families from one place to another. All these points are abundantly proved by reference to the most authentic medical records. The difficulty is only to select instances from the immense number which exist.

Dr. Marcet states, in his evidence given to the committee of the House of Commons, for inquiring into the state of contagious fever in the metropolis, that in Guy's Hospital, fevers occasionally did occur among the patients arising from contagion. "Of these," he says, "no less than five have occurred, amongst my own patients, within the last six weeks; viz. three men who caught fevers in the hospital, while under treatment for various other disorders; one nurse, who died, and one female patient, "who was convalescent of a surgical disorder, when she caught the fever in one of the wards, where she is now lying in a critical state‡." Dr. Yelloly states a similar, though less decisive case. Dr. Currie reports, that, in St. Thomas's Hospital, fever has occasionally spread to the nurses, and occasionally it has appeared to be communicated to other patients, but both these occurrences were very rare§. It is to be observed, that we are not at present inquiring into the frequency of the instances of contagion, but whether any such instances are on record.

These are by no means insulated facts: a multitude of others might be adduced, leading to the same conclusions; but the details would be too voluminous for insertion here. If the reader is desirous of tracing the effects of contagion on a scale of greater magnitude, he will find ample records of such in the official documents, relative to the epidemic typhous fever, which devastated Ireland in the years 1817, 1818, and 1819. The Report from the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the state of disease, and condition of the labouring poor in Ireland; and the "Account of the Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Fever, lately Epidemical in Ireland," published by Dr. Barker and Dr. Cheyne, contain a body of evidence clearly demonstrative of the influence of contagion. It appears to us impossible that any candid or unprejudiced person, can, after examining this evidence, refuse his assent to the reality of such an agency.

"Persons exposed to contact with the sick, or to their effluvia, very generally become sufferers, the certainty of an attack bearing some proportion to the amount of exposure. When fever commenced in a poor family, or was introduced by a stranger or lodger, it generally extended to all its members. The poor were the chief sufferers, in consequence of their neglect of cleanliness, particularly with respect to their clothing, and the smallness and crowded state of their apartments, evils at this time much increased by the extreme poverty which weighed them down. On the other hand, the superior classes, whose circumstances were different, their clothing more frequently changed, their persons more cleanly, their apartments less crowded and better ventilated, and among whom seclusion from the sick was practised, in proportion to their enjoyment of these advantages, generally escaped the disease. And that such exemptions did not depend on any other causes than those here assigned, is proved by the great suffering of persons of this class, when sufficiently exposed to contagion by communication with the sick. Thus the medical attendants in fever hospitals and dispensaries, and the Clergy, more especially those of the Roman Catholic Church, whose duties brought them into contact with fever patients, were very general sufferers, and considerable numbers of them became victims *."

It would involve us into too extensive details, were we to attempt to adduce any of the numerous instances, which fully warrant the statement here made; we can only refer the reader to the works above quoted, for the particular proofs. It will be sufficient to observe, that in some of the hospitals, every medical attendant connected with the establishment suffered from fever; in almost all, the disease attacked a large proportion of the physicians, students, nurses, or other persons in immediate attendance on the sick. This large proportion of victims to fever, was not confined to the precincts of hospitals; it also occurred among those practitioners who had frequent intercourse with the sick at their own dwellings. Nor were these consequences of communication with the sick, in persons of this rank of life, limited to the medical attendants only: several of those persons, whose humanity led them to inspect the wards, and who thus braved danger from no motive but benevolence, caught the disease. It was fully proved that the medical, and other visitors of the sick, were oftener attacked with this fever, than persons in the same condition of life who were not similarly exposed. The facts abundantly demonstrate that poverty and its attendant consequences, were not essential to the production of this fever. Persons of inferior stations, though well fed and clothed, who came into contact with the sick in hospitals, suffered in an extraordinary degree. In Dr. Crampton's medical report of the fever department of Steevens' Hospital, it is observed "that, with the exception of Dr. Harvey and himself, all concerned in attendance on the patients caught the disease; none of the nurses, none of the porters, barbers, or those occupied in handling, washing, or tending on the sick, escaped, and many of them had relapses, and recurrences of fever." This was not confined to that hospital or city, for it was observed in almost all parts of the country, that persons engaged in attendance on fever patients, more especially if their duties brought them into immediate contact with the sick, rarely escaped the disease. Clerical visitors of the sick, were also observed to suffer in a very remarkable degree; in the great mortality which took place from fever, among this class of the community, who in the discharge of their religious duties, were peculiarly exposed to infection, compared with those of similar condition, but who had less intercourse with the sick, we have the most irrefragable proof of the influence of contagion.

The communication of the disease by vagrants and mendicants, also strongly corroborates the opinion of its contagious nature.

"To the influence of this cause, Ireland is peculiarly exposed; the miserable state of its peasantry in some parts of the country, much increased of late years by want of employment, and during the prevalence of epidemic fever by scarcity of food, had both extended and augmented those habits of migration, which at all times contribute to spread contagious disease. The effects of such migration at this time may be easily conceived, when we consider that many of these wretched wanderers were either labouring under fever, or convalescent from it, or that they carried with them filthy and neglected clothing, which had recently been in contact with the sick. The spreading of fever in many parts of Ireland, was distinctly referable to vagrants and mendicants. The humane and hospitable disposition of the people of Ireland, mainly contributed to introduce contagion into their dwellings; for the wandering stranger was seldom refused a night's lodging in most parts of the country, till experience of its formidable consequences, showed the necessity of abandoning this practice. So general were the reports as to the pernicious influence of vagrancy and mendicity in communicating disease, that it became a subject of legislative enactment, and the 59th of Geo. III. in the year 1819, was framed to abate this evil."

The following are a few among the more striking proofs of the extension of fever from this cause.

"From Dublin to Gorey," says Dr. Cheyne, "I heard complaints of the injury which the country had sustained from the beggars, who were banished from Dublin last season by the mendicity association. Many of these wanderers actually laboured under fever, and others probably conveyed contagion from house to house in their clothes; and contagion, when so conveyed, is generally supposed to be more active and injurious, than when it proceeds from the persons of the infected. This, which is an important consideration in the prevention of fever, may be practically illustrated by the following occurrence, which took place in the neighbourhood of Gorey, under the eye of a respectable physician of that town, just before fever became epidemic. A beggar from Limerick obtained admission into a labourer's cabin for herself and a dying child. In five days after she quitted the cabin, fever took place in one of the family, which consisted of the man, his wife, and five children; and in succession, within a day or two of each other, every individual sickened; two children from a neighbouring cabin, who had attended the child's wake, took the same fever within ten days thereafter, and communicated it to their family. The beggar (herself in good health) went to a farmer's house, two miles off, and obtained a lodging that night after her child was buried; every individual in that family, a man, his wife, two children, and a servant, also took the fever within a few days: these fevers were all severe. In the parish of Delgany, county of Wicklow, the small farmers and labourers who refused admission to beggars, and who ceased to frequent wakes, escaped the fever, while others of the same class suffered; and some months after a fever had gone through a family on the Wicklow mountains, it was frequently re-introduced by beggars from Dublin*.

* Drs. Barker and Cheyne, Account of the Fever in Ireland, vol. i. p. 134.

† Report from Select Committee, p. 139 and 141.

"In the neighbourhood of Darrow, a woman from Kilkenny, with a sick child, introduced the disease into twelve or fifteen houses, which were her resting-places in wandering through that country. Her track for many miles could be traced, by the disease which she left behind her. Near Cuffesborough, in the same neighbourhood, it was introduced by a strolling beggar in the same manner†."

"No doubt is entertained in the county of Galway, as to the contagious nature of the epidemic fever; amongst the lower orders, it uniformly extended through every individual of a family, when one became affected. It was carried from place to place by the beggars; hence it spread more rapidly in the suburbs of the towns and villages where the mendicants were usually lodged; and this extension of febrile contagion ceased (comparatively speaking) when measures were taken to exclude these hordes of strangers from sojourning in the towns‡."

"A person resident at Ballyduff, who died of fever, had bequeathed his clothes to an inhabitant of the opposite side of the river; and soon after this event, the disease spread through the family into which the clothes had been received§."

Proofs equally strong of the influence of contagion, although of a negative kind, are afforded by the exemption from fever, which was enjoyed by certain descriptions of persons, who had little or no intercourse with the sick. In the report from the county of Waterford, it is remarked, that from this circumstance, little or no fever had appeared among the society of Quakers.

"That seclusion exerts a strong preservative influence, was exemplified by facts derived from unquestionable authority. In the charity school of Killoteran, about three miles distant from Waterford, containing fifty-six boys, no case of fever had occurred, either during the last summer, or since that time, when the disease was so prevalent in Waterford, and the immediate vicinity of the school. The master had received particular directions to prevent all communication with the town, or surrounding neighbourhood. These directions had been carefully observed. A fact of a different kind, by shewing that comfortable circumstances, and cleanly habits, are alone insufficient to confer security, without a certain degree of seclusion, tends to confirm its preventive efficacy: many of the inferior classes, such as farmers and others, whose circumstances were tolerably comfortable, and habits cleanly, suffered considerably from fever, arising probably from their more frequent and continued intercourse with persons in the lowest rank, amongst whom it was chiefly prevalent||."

Careful seclusion, and the adoption of means calculated to prevent the spreading of disease, as soon as it appeared, were successful in preserving the inmates of the House of Industry at Cork, and the Foundling Hospital of that city, from the disease, at a time when it was very prevalent among the inhabitants in general. In the jail at Cork, the prisoners remained free from fever, when it had spread in every direction amongst the inhabitants of that city, by great attention to the purification of the clothes of the prisoners, and to their wearing jail dresses. After a year and a half, during which this system had been perfectly successful in excluding fever, it was discontinued in consequence of the expense attending the jail dresses: and then fever began to shew itself among the prisoners. The general exemption from fever among the military throughout Ireland, is another striking exemplification of the efficacy of seclusion, accompanied by superior comforts and cleanliness, in repelling this disease.

Certain insulated places, such as the island of Rathlin, on the coast of Antrim; and that of Cape Clear, on the southern point of Ireland, were totally exempt from typhus fever, during the period of its prevalence in the rest of the country. In the latter of these islands, instances of common fever occurred, arising from heat, or cold, or too great exertion; but no typhus. The island of Cape Clear is seven miles distant from the shore, and fever was every where prevalent along the adjacent sea-coast, during the period above referred to¶.

With regard to the island of Rathlin, a curious fact is stated, by Dr. McDonnell, of Belfast. In August, 1814, when there was little or no fever on the coast of Antrim, on going to the island, which is about four miles from the main land, "I was surprised to find two families," says the Doctor, "about the centre of the island, with Typhus. In the first house, I inquired in vain as to the origin of the fever; but on visiting the second house, I discovered that some of the connexions of the family had died in Greenock; they had gone there to visit the sick, and had brought home the clothes of those who died at Greenock, in a chest, and had taken this disorder soon after their return*." By proper treatment and precautions, the disease soon ceased, but not until several were affected, and three or four died. Since that period, and during the whole of the late epidemic, no case of typhus whatever has occurred on that island, although it was very prevalent on every part of the coast opposite Rathlin. "Now it cannot be said," observes Dr. McDonnell, "that the exemption of this island arises from the inhabitants being of a different description, being less exposed to cold, heat, fatigue, hunger, bad food, filth, moisture, confined air, and the long list of causes, supposed capable of producing this dreadful distemper. Their exemption arises from the perfect conviction the people now have, that the distemper is portable, and that it was imported in 1814." They send away all itinerant mendicants coming over from Ireland or Scotland; and when a native of the island, in November last, crossed the channel, to attend a relative in fever, she was not suffered to return.

The success which has attended the establishment of fever hospitals in various parts of the kingdom, in checking the progress of contagious fever, is a further proof of the soundness of that doctrine for which we are contending. In confirmation of this, we need only refer to the Reports concerning these hospitals, at Manchester, Liverpool, Chester, and London. The opening of the House of Recovery at Manchester, is stated by Dr. Ferriar, to have been immediately followed by a very remarkable reduction in the number of patients with fever in the whole town†. Similar results were obtained at Chester, according to the testimony of Dr. Haygarth‡, and at Liverpool, from the report of Dr. Currie§.

The facts already cited, speak for themselves; and establish beyond the possibility of doubt, the contagious nature of typhus.

The evidence for the contagious nature of the plague, is as direct and conclusive as that which establishes the contagiousness of typhus. Those, indeed, who, like Dr. Maclean and his followers, consider plague as only an aggravated form of typhus, must admit the proofs already given of the existence of contagion in the latter, to apply with full force to the reality of the same property in the former. As far as those who hold that opinion are concerned, the question may be regarded as decided. But as the great majority of physicians esteem the plague to be a specific disease, differing from typhus, not merely in degree, but in kind, it is incumbent upon us to examine the question on independent grounds. By all parties, however, it must be conceded, that the strong analogy which subsists between these two diseases, is an argument in favour of the probability of the plague being contagious; if the same property has been proved to belong to typhus.

It is surely unnecessary again to reply to the same arguments urged against the contagion of the plague, as have already been sufficiently refuted when applied to that of typhus. We are ready to admit, that there are many occasions in which the contagion of the plague is totally inert, and its effects not perceptible; for the same reasons that the contagious of typhus, of small-pox, and of scarlatina, or of any other contagious epidemic, are occasionally quite inoperative. But theories, opinions, and speculations, must give way to the positive evidence of facts: and facts in abundance there are of the communication of plague from one individual to another, by contact, by fomites, and also by effluvia; and conversely, it has been clearly demonstrated, that strict seclusion, and interdiction of all the modes by which contagion can be transmitted, has given effectual protection against the appearance of this disease. Whole volumes might be filled with the evidence in proof of these assertions, contained in the writings of those who have themselves witnessed the ravages of the disease in the countries where it constantly prevails, and in those places which have received it from them by importation. The limits of this article will not allow us to do more than to give a few examples, taken from the most authentic sources, and to speak in general terms of the rest.

The perusal of the works of Dr. Mead and Dr. Russell, should alone be sufficient to satisfy us as to the contagiousness of the plague. "All the appearances attending this disease," says Dr. Mead, "are very easily explained upon this principle, and are hardly to be accounted for on any other*." That the plague has been communicated from Egypt, and the Levant, to various parts of the west of Europe, is evinced, by its constantly being found to follow the track of commercial intercourse with those countries. "The several countries of Europe have always suffered more or less from plague, according as they had a greater or less commerce with Africa, or the Levant†." Its importation has been distinctly traced from thence into France, Holland, and other parts of the north of Europe. Marseilles, otherwise a very healthy town, was formerly peculiarly exposed to the danger of receiving the plague, from its great intercourse with the sources of infection: and twenty visitations of this terrible scourge are recorded in that city. The first appearance of the plague in any country is always in maritime places, where it would naturally break out on its first importation; and its early line of extension has always been from the coast, towards the interior of the country‡. The direct channel through which the plague was imported into Marseilles, in May 1720, is circumstantially made out; but the details being too long to be inserted here, we shall content ourselves with referring to the account given by Dr. Russell§. The progress of the disease has in general been from the towns to the surrounding country; thus Dr. De Mertens reported, that the plague was conveyed to the villages round Moscow, in the year 1771, by the removal of persons labouring under that malady; and the same formerly happened in the villages near London. It appears to be pretty certain, that the introduction of the plague into modern Europe, was in consequence of the Crusades: and from the ignorance which prevailed, as to the real nature of the disease, and the mode of its propagation, its visitations were much more frequent and extensive, and its ravages more terrible and destructive, than they have been in later times. The epidemic which raged at Marseilles in 1720, was, in the short space of seven months, fatal to no less than 60,000 of the inhabitants. Its introduction into Messina, about the same period, was also distinctly traced to the Levant; and in consequence, 43,000 persons perished in that town, in the course of three months. The epidemic which broke out in London, in 1598, destroying 11,500 persons, was proved to have been imported from Alkmaar. In 1603, when above 36,000 people fell victims to the plague, the contagion was introduced from Ostend. Six years after this, the disease again raged at Alkmaar, and extended its ravages to Denmark: but in consequence of a suspension of the communication between these countries and England, it was not again conveyed to us. But in 1625, it broke out again in London, at which time it was traced to Denmark. In its next appearance, in 1636, its origin was traced to Leyden. Its last visit to this country was in 1665, when the total number of its victims, upon the most moderate calculation, was not less than 68,000. The Quarantine laws were afterwards established, and we have ever since enjoyed complete immunity from this terrific calamity.

It may be confidently asserted, that the true plague has never been known to make its appearance in any place in the western parts of Europe, excepting at a time when a communication subsisted between that place and a country actually infected with the disease. Contagious fevers, and the fevers produced by marsh miasmata, have prevailed in various parts of the world, at different times, and with various degrees of virulence. Yet in no one instance has the plague arisen spontaneously, or from any of the ordinary causes of fever, not even in the West Indies, in Italy, in Walcheren, in Batavia, Vera Cruz, or whatever spot or climate on the globe has been more destructive of human life. At Malta the plague has been repeatedly introduced. Ciantaro, in his description of Malta, gives a distinct account of its importation at four different periods. The first was in 1592, by means of four galleys, which brought into the port a Turkish prize from Alexandria, where the plague was raging, and which had 150 Turks on board.

The second appearance of the plague in Malta, was in 1623; but by taking immediate precautions, and sending all those attacked to the Lazarettos, its progress was stopped, almost in its origin. The third instance occurred ten years afterwards, breaking out, as before, in a house near the Porta Maggiore, where the ships from the Levant usually anchored; and being traced to the ships themselves. The whole family in that house was soon infected; but by transferring them immediately to the Lazaretto, the disease was happily extinguished. The fourth event of this nature, in 1675, was attended with far more disastrous consequences. It was attributed to some linen, brought from a Levant vessel, by a Maltese shopkeeper, which, after producing the disease in all those who first came in contact with it; ultimately disseminated the malady throughout the whole population*. The real nature of the disease not being suspected, when it first appeared many families became infected, before the requisite precautions could be enforced. Some difference of opinion having arisen among the commissioners who superintended the police, insubordination took place, and sufficient care was not taken to seclude those persons, who were actually infected by the disease: thus all the efforts of government to prevent the dissemination of the contagion proved ineffectual. At length, after the disorder had prevailed during four months, the aid of French physicians was procured, and rigid regulations were adopted, and carried into effect; all the people being strictly confined to their houses, and those infected, or suspected of being so, being removed to the Lazaretto. From that moment the disease diminished, and within three months entirely disappeared, after destroying one-sixth of the population.

A lesson so dearly bought was not likely to be soon forgotten; a rigid system of quarantine regulations was put in force; and Malta was preserved for 137 years from any invasion of that formidable distemper. This long exemption from the plague is an unequivocal proof that the climate of the island has no tendency to generate the disease. The arrival of the brig, San Nicolo, from Alexandria, in March 1813, having the plague on board, of which the captain and two of the crew died, after being sent to the Lazaretto, was followed, about a fortnight afterwards, by the breaking out of the plague in the family of Salvatore Borg. After the death of his daughter and wife, he was himself seized with the same disease, which till then had not been recognized to be the plague, and of which he also soon fell a victim. Two days afterwards, a schoolmistress of the name of Maria Agius, who had attended Mrs. Borg during her illness, was found dead in her own house. The person who made this discovery, and who had touched and shaken her body, ran to the committee of health to acquaint them with the circumstance, and was by them immediately sent to the Lazaretto, where, in a few days, he was seized with plague and died in the course of twenty-four hours. A few days after the death of Maria Agius, a girl who lived in habits of intimacy with her, and slept in the same house, was attacked with the same disease. The father of Borg, and another of his children, were the next victims.

"In the above cited instances," says Sir Arthur Brooke Faulkner, "the contagion has been traced in a direct line, a month and twenty days subsequent to the first entrance of the San Nicolo, and above a month after Borg's first infected child was taken ill in Valetta; added to which, it is proved by official statements, that up to this period, there were no other individuals, excepting those already detailed, infected in any part of Malta." "About this time, the contagion began to diverge in so many directions, in consequence of the unrestrained intercourse of the people, that it would have been extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to follow up the direct line of contaminations, even if the investigation had been earnestly pursued, which I have reason to believe was not the fact."

From Valetta, the contagion made its way in a direct line into the neighbouring cassals or villages, where it raged with great violence. The means of its communication from one of these to the neighbouring island of Gozo, at a late period of the calamity, have been distinctly ascertained. A man belonging to an infected family in the village of Curmi, made his escape with a box of clothes into a neighbouring cottage; it was speedily found out that he had escaped, and he was accordingly apprehended and sent to the Lazaretto, previous to which he had contrived to conceal the box in his garden. On his being released from confinement in the Lazaretto, he returned to the cottage, which then happened to be without the cordons of troops, dug up his box, and hiring a boat, carried it with him to the island of Gozo, where he had some relations. To these he gave some of the clothes contained in the box. The family who received this fatal present, were the first who were infected on the island; and a priest acquainted with this family was one of the first victims; he died with well-marked symptoms of the plague. The man who had introduced the contagion also died of it*.

The authentic narratives we possess of this particular epidemic, shew clearly that its progress did not extend from mere vicinity of situation, but that it could be traced to distinct houses, through the intercourse of friends and relations. Thus the contagion became dispersed throughout the town from a very early period, and before the public had taken the alarm. A false confidence also prevailed that the danger had ceased; and after the disease was fully declared, it was believed, that it would necessarily subside of itself as the summer advanced. These erroneous opinions, combined with the opposition that was made to the salutary measures enjoined by the government, contributed in no small degree, to the destructive progress of the malady. This was particularly proved by its protracted duration in the village of Carmi. The decline of the plague, and its final eradication, were the result of the adoption of more vigorous measures; namely, proper classification of the inhabitants, and the absolute separation of the healthy, the sick, and the suspected. In those barracks, where a strict quarantine system was kept up, the plague was excluded, although they were situated in an unhealthy part of the town; while in other places, that were more elevated and airy, but where the same precautions were not observed, the disease was introduced†. Oiled silk dresses were ordered to be worn by every person in the barracks who were in attendance on the sick; and not one of these, who were thus protected from contact with the patients, caught the disease. On the contrary, almost all those who were employed in carrying out the dead, and who trusted to the security afforded by rubbing the body with oil, perished from the disease. The periods of the increase, decline, and cessation of the disease appeared to have no connexion with the temperature of the air, or other atmospheric changes. The time of the year in which it broke out, namely, May, is the very healthiest season of the year in Malta: it began to decline after the rigid system of police was in operation, in August and September, which are the most unhealthy months; and was not totally extirpated till the month of February following. At Gozo, it began in March, the very healthiest season of the year; and was extirpated precisely before the commencement of the violent heats, which is the unhealthiest season‡. The disease was arrested by the enforcement of restrictive regulations, in several of the casals, during the period of its widest dissemination in other places§.

A striking instance of the security obtained from seclusion occurred with regard to the Augustine Convent.

"This convent, situated in a peculiarly healthful, spacious, and airy part of Valetta, had, from the very beginning, observed the greatest caution to shun communication with the public. It was at length, however, infected, in consequence of one of the servants, who was caterer by occupation, having, in disobedience of public orders, gone to a very contaminated part of the town, called the Manderaggio, and purchased infected clothes. Shortly after his return, he made confession of the circumstance, when one of the brotherhood belonging to this convent, out of compassion, immediately volunteered to attend him, placing himself at the same time, in strict quarantine with the patient. Both nurse and patient immediately fell victims to the disease, but no other individual under the same roof was ever assailed||."

To this we may add, on the same authority, that the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, the prison, and several public offices, and private houses, which early adopted, and strictly kept up, a rigid system of insulation, enjoyed a perfect exemption from the contagion.

The supporters of the doctrine of malaria maintain, that with the decrease of the disease its violence also subsides."

"To this alleged fact," says Sir Thomas Maitland, "I paid the utmost attention, and I can prove, by authentic documents, that so far from this being the case at Malta, the last cases were the most violent; and in the instance of the last hundred, by far the most fatal*."

Much has been said about the want of distinct evidence, that any communication had taken place between the family of Borg, which was the first affected with plague, and the ship which is believed to have brought the infection. On this point, indeed, it is confidently asserted, both by Sir A. B. Faulkner, and by Sir Thomas Maitland, that some smuggled article, whether linen or leather, had been conveyed from the ship to the house of Borg. It was clear, however, that considerable difficulty must always arise in discovering any similar transgression of the laws, especially, when from the consequences which ensued, such odium would be incurred by the culprit, if discovered. But we should consider, in a question of this kind, that although it may be impossible to trace with perfect accuracy every step of the communication, from person to person, up to the original source of infection; yet if the general course of that line of communication is in all its other parts clearly and distinctly made out, we have in truth sufficient data for establishing the moral certainty of the continuity of that line, notwithstanding it appears broken in a single point.

The circumstances attending the introduction and suppression of the plague in the Ionian Islands, within these few years, are also perfectly decisive of its contagious nature. It would occupy too much space to enter into details upon this subject; and we shall therefore content ourselves with mentioning a few particulars on the authority of Sir Thomas Maitland. The plague broke out in the beginning of 1816, at Corfu, where, in consequence of early inattention, it had acquired such a footing as to continue four months in the island; it was at length extirpated by the active exertions of Sir Thomas Maitland. Its origin was very satisfactorily traced to the clandestine importation of two boxes of infected clothes from Albania. The boxes were opened in a house called Casa Polita, in Corfu, by a man who bought the box from the smuggler in presence of some of his associates; and soon after, eight or nine of the smugglers were taken ill, in that very house. The whole of the family living in the house of the man who had opened the box, together with himself, died. "The belief was, that sorcery existed, and that the house must be exorcised. Accordingly, the papas of the different villages were all called in, and having exorcised the house, they went away, and each, and all of them, carried into their several villages the plague†." It was thus spread at once to twenty-six or twenty-seven different villages; and the difficulty of arresting its progress was much increased.

In the same year, the plague appeared at Cephalonia, having been brought into that island by persons who had been reaping the harvest on the continent, in Epirus and the Morea‡.

It deserves to be remembered, that the plague began in Corfu, in November, with the healthy season, and ceased exactly when the unhealthy season began. But in Cephalonia, the plague began and ended during the hot months. What strongly confirms the doctrine of contagion in this disease, is, that the troops employed on all these occasions, as guards, continued healthy. Had it depended solely on the state of the air, they would infallibly have been seized, for they were in the very focus of the disorder. In epidemic remittents, it is well known, the new-comers are those who suffer, while the natives comparatively escape; but here the very reverse was the case. Those very troops, who, while employed in stopping the plague, never caught it, suffered severely after the plague had disappeared, from the common fever of the country, in consequence of being kept, from necessity, in unhealthy stations, after the unhealthy season had commenced. It is manifest, from all these facts, that the progress of the plague had no visible connexion with seasons or states of the atmosphere.

It is evidently much more difficult to trace the progress of the contagion of plague in countries where this disease is frequently and extensively prevalent, as it is throughout all the Turkish dominions and the Barbary states, where great numbers having had the disease in various degrees, or having been long inured to the contagion, have become very little susceptible of its effects; where the grossest ignorance and apathy prevails with respect to its nature and consequences among all ranks of people:—and where the seeds of the contagion, already universally scattered, are ready to burst forth, whenever the circumstances, formerly adverted to, arise to renew its activity and favour its diffusion. As well might we hope to be able to trace to its source every instance of small-pox, measles, or hooping-cough occurring in London, as to expect to succeed in a similar research with regard to the plague at Constantinople or Morocco. Yet even in these cities, the efficacy of seclusion in interposing a barrier to its progress, has been unequivocally demonstrated. In the mercantile towns in the Levant, it is the established practice with the European residents to shut themselves up in their houses on the first appearance of the plague, and to receive provisions with certain precautions; and so uniformly successful is this practice, when strictly adhered to, that Dr. Russel asserts,

“A case could hardly be specified, in which a secluded family had been affected, where the mischief could not be traced to some violation of the rules of confinement; and if a few cases occur which cannot be so accounted for, he must be an unreasonable man who will contend that no breach of rules, or casual and forgotten imprudence, had introduced contagion.”

Dr. Stokes observes upon this passage, that,

“When we recollect how perpetually we are in want of the communication of society for every article we use, it seems even more wonderful that any families living in a town, and in the habits of perpetual communication, should submit to seclusion, than that this should be often violated.”

This is well illustrated by the evidence given before the Select Committee of the House of Commons by Mr. Hayes, who had resided nearly all his life in Smyrna, and who stated that when the plague prevailed in that town, his household was shut up from all communication with the inhabitants, except through purveyors, who are generally people who have had the plague themselves, and of course not susceptible of taking it again. The disease, however, has been known sometimes to get into the house; but Mr. Hayes declares that he could almost always trace it to some imprudence of the domestics, such as bringing infected clothes into the house: and speaks positively of such facts as having occurred within his own knowledge†. A similar result on a larger scale was seen in the effect of shutting up or wholly insulating the quarter of the town inhabited by the Franks or Christian population, during the prevalence of the plague in Constantinople and Aleppo‡. In the plague of Moscow, 1771, of which the history is very ably drawn up by Dr. De Mertens, and which was productive of so tremendous a mortality, that 70,000 inhabitants were cut off in a few months, and sometimes 12,000 in the course of a single day, the Foundling Hospital, containing 1000 persons, was preserved perfectly free from the disease, in the midst of the surrounding destruction, by the most strict and rigid system of insulation. Every avenue to the hospital was carefully blocked up, except a single entrance, which was strictly guarded both night and day, so as to secure it most effectually from violation. The disease had been introduced into Moscow by a communication with the Turkish army. The account given by Mr. Jackson of the plague which prevailed in 1799 and 1800 at Morocco, and of the effects of which he was an eye-witness, accord so perfectly with the preceding statements, as to render it unnecessary to give any further details in proof of what has already been the result of such an accumulation of evidence.

The British expedition into Egypt in 1801, 2, and 3, furnished ample opportunities of studying the disease; and the experience of the army medical practitioners has brought the most decisive confirmation of the received opinion as to the contagiousness of the plague. Very satisfactory evidence on this head is contained in memoirs drawn up by Mr. (now Sir John) Webb, at the request of the President and Committee of the College of Physicians, and inserted in the last volume of their Transactions§. It would detain us too long to give an analysis of this valuable report: we shall only state one very striking fact which is there related.

A lieutenant of the 10th regiment of foot was attacked, while in Alexandria, with the plague, and ordered to be conveyed within the boundary of the quarantine; but his removal could not be effected till two days after, in consequence of the wetness of the weather. A hole having been accidentally torn in his moequito curtain, his servant, John Lee, took it, without his master's knowledge, to the regimental hospital to be repaired, having prevailed on the sentinel to let him pass in direct violation of his orders. The curtain was repaired by a private of the same regiment of the name of William Bower, and then carried back by Lee, who then, at his own request, accompanied his master to the Pest Hospital, and attended him till he recovered. On the fourteenth day after this visit to Bower, the latter was taken ill with very suspicious symptoms, which could not be accounted for until the circumstance of his having repaired the curtain occurred to his recollection. The next morning it became certain that his disease was the plague, and he died the same evening*.

The facts stated by Dr. Frank, in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons, respecting the establishment of the Plague Hospital at Aboukir, in 1800, and the success which attended the adoption of measures for insulating the sick, in preventing the extension of the disease to the army before Alexandria, are also quite conclusive in favour of its being contagious†. See also the evidence of Sir James Macgregor, which is to the same effect‡.

Such then are the facts, for the explanation of which we are called upon to frame some rational and consistent theory. The question we have to decide is the following. Must we believe that the numberless coincidences that have been observed between certain events, namely, the communication of persons with others having the plague, or with the clothes they had worn, and the subsequent seizure of those persons with the very same disease, have every one of them, being the result of pure chance; and that no other cause has operated, than a general one existing in the atmosphere only, and consisting in its contamination, or its corruption, or malaria,—or by whatever other name we may designate this mysterious source of disease? Or will not these coincidences be much more simply, more intelligibly, and more philosophically explained by the supposition of contagion; a principle of which the operation is well known, and is recognized to exist in other analogous diseases? The former theory involves us in a maze of inextricable perplexity; the latter furnishes a clue by which we escape all the principal difficulties. Malaria may, perhaps, account for a few of the circumstances attending the periodic rise and cessation of some endemic diseases; but it opens only a single entrance, and leaves us in the threshold of the inquiry. Contagion is the master-key which unlocks all the avenues to the knowledge of the true nature of pestilential communication.

The facts which prove contagion are positive; and from the very nature of the question, it is impossible that any facts that can be brought on the opposite side can be other than negative facts. If of a hundred persons exposed to infection, ninety escape, and only ten receive it, does not the fact of its taking effect in these ten sufficiently prove the agency of contagion, notwithstanding the failure of its operation in the other cases? The failures can only indicate the limits of this operation; but its reality may be established by a very small number of facts. If a strange dog, running across the country, should have bitten several persons, and if of these only two or three should afterwards be seized with hydrophobia, the rest remaining free from disease, can the escape of these be adduced as any argument that the dog was not mad, or that hydrophobia is not contagious? And yet this is the kind of argument brought forward by the non-contagionists, as if negative evidence could invalidate the conclusions from positive facts.

That the plague, under certain circumstances is not communicated, and therefore may appear not to be contagious, is no more than what happens in many other diseases which are known to be infectious: it is seen occasionally, even in the small-pox and measles. If the hypothesis of malaria could account for the rapid variations in the progress of an epidemic, it might perhaps be worthy of some consideration; but, in fact, it leaves us totally in the dark respecting them. Even if we understood the atmospheric changes, which are alleged to have so important an influence on these diseases, they would still be perfectly compatible with the agency of contagion, the operations of which they tend in some cases to impede, and in others to promote.

Equally unfounded are all the other objections that have been made to the contagiousness of the plague. It has been supposed, for instance, that the plague is merely an aggravated form of typhus, varying perpetually in its degrees and aspects, so as to deserve the character of a proteiform disease. If the fact were so, our belief in its being contagious, would only be the more strengthened from the conviction we have obtained, that typhus is contagious. But all the best informed physicians, those who have known it from personal observation, and have had direct opportunities of witnessing its symptoms, and studying its nature, regard it as a specific disease, distinguished by peculiar characters. As well might it be said, that scarlet fever was not a specific disease, because we find it, even in the same epidemic, appearing under a great variety of forms, though derived from the same contagion.

It is asserted, that the plague begins and ceases at periods surprisingly regular. We have already shewn, that this proposition is completely falsified by the history of the epidemic at Malta, and the Ionian islands. In like manner the assertion, that it appears soonest in unhealthy places, is refuted by the same series of facts. The course of its progress in Malta, and every other place where it could properly be observed, was just what would necessarily happen, supposing it to be propagated solely by contagion; and its extirpation invariably followed the adoption of measures founded upon this supposition.

The Select Committee of the House of Commons, having referred the subject of Dr. Maclean's doctrines to the College of Physicians, through the Privy Council, the following is their answer to the principal questions proposed to them.

"1st.—We are of opinion, although some epidemic diseases are not propagated by contagion, that it is by no means proved, that the plague is not contagious, or that the regulations of plague police are useless or pernicious. We are persuaded, on the contrary, from the consideration of the experience of all ages, and some of us from personal observation, that the disease is communicable from one individual to another.

"2nd.—The additional proofs which would be required of the non-existence of contagion, must be such proofs as would be sufficient to counterbalance the "general opinion of medical and philosophical authors and historians, from the times of Thucydides, Aristotle, and Galen, to the present day: so late as the year 1813, the contagious nature of plague was fully ascertained by the British medical officers in the island of Malta.

"3rd.—The doctrine of contagion appears to us to be wholly unshaken, by any argument which Dr. Maclean has advanced; at the same time we think it probable, that some of the personal restrictions enforced in the establishments for quarantine, might be modified without risk to the public safety."

In a subsequent letter, they declare, that nothing contained in Dr. Maclean's second volume, has altered the opinion expressed by the College in their former report."

Yet the discussions which the subject has undergone, have not been wholly unproductive of benefit. The attention of observers has been awakened to the great influence, which various circumstances exert on the activity of contagion. The efficacy of a pure and continually renewed atmosphere, and of a scrupulous attention to cleanliness, in disarming contagion of its power, has been placed in a stronger light, than that in which it had before been generally viewed: and will tend to restrain within more reasonable bounds, the excessive dread which has sometimes been entertained of the activity of contagion. The positive proofs which exist of the contagiousness of typhus, of scarlatina, and of plague, in certain circumstances, render it absolutely imperative on us to act, in all cases where these diseases are concerned, on the presumption that contagion may be operating. It has been abundantly proved by a multitude of facts well known to medical men, that these contagions are often exceedingly subtle and insidious, and our vigilance should therefore be unceasing to close every avenue to their introduction, and to destroy every germ that can be discovered to exist. That England might again be visited by the plague, is undeniable. The recent example of Malta is sufficient evidence, that the exemption of nearly a century and a half, is no proof of absolute security against the possible introduction of so terrible a scourge. The devastation which a pestilence would produce in a populous country like this, where the constant intercourse between all ranks of society, and between the most distant parts of the kingdom, would conspire to spread the contagion far and wide, with unexampled celerity, bids defiance to all calculation. The quarantine regulations are our safeguard against so tremendous a calamity. The alarm excited on the continent, by the discussions that have taken place in this country, however unfounded, had begun to produce very serious inconvenience to our commerce; and shews us, that whatever evils may result from the shackles which the quarantine laws impose on trade, they are not to be compared with the impediments it would have to encounter, from the precautionary measures that the continental powers would deem it necessary to resort to, if any material relaxation of those laws were to take place here. Already, at Marseilles, and at Genoa, as we are informed by Mr. Canning, has a much longer quarantine been imposed on British shipping, than on that of any other nation. At Naples, in addition to the usual term of quarantine, a term of three weeks has been imposed upon British vessels that had quitted England, since the non-contagionists have been so busily promulgating their opinions. We cannot therefore but agree with him, in the wish, that if experiments on the question of the contagiousness of the plague are to be carried on, they should be tried and exhibited, as such experiments anciently were, in corpore vili, rather than upon the interests and commercial pursuits of a great nation, or upon the safety and the lives of millions of our population.

CONSTITUTION.

Private Committees of the Two Houses.

We cannot make our readers better understand the abuses of the private bill system, than by describing the process of making a private bill into a law.

The first step taken by the managers of any project which may require a private act, is to reserve a considerable number of shares in the undertaking for distribution amongst members of parliament, who, together with the shares, receive an intimation, as Mr. Gurney stated in the House, that they are expected to use "their best exertions on all occasions to promote the success of the project"; in plain language, to vote for the bill when and where the promoters please, in return for the shares. Having by these means, and by the influence they can command over members in case their constituents are interested, secured a body of constant and active supporters, they lodge, in the hands of one of their retained members, a petition to the House of Commons for leave to bring in their bill: he presents it, and names a committee (we need not say of what members) to consider whether the petitioners have complied with the standing orders of the House as to the time of presenting petitions, and other subsidiary points. If there be any opposition to the bill, the adversaries, who take care to enlist a phalanx of members on their side, instruct one of them to move that "all who come to the committee shall have voices;" that is, that any member who chooses to put his head into the committee-room may vote. If this committee, whose proceedings are sometimes conducted with the most surprising disorder, decide in favour of the petitioners, the bill is brought in and read twice. Should the promoters fear any opposition in the House, they take care to send down their adherents; and, moreover, canvass all the other members, not excepting the king's ministers, with the greatest assiduity, by letter, and oftentimes from door to door, never delicate about charging their adversaries with the most dangerous intentions. Some of the canvassing letters which were profusely distributed amongst the members during the last two sessions have fallen into our hands, and if we felt at liberty to present them to our readers, with the names and dates, they would form very striking and authentic records of the intrigues carried on upon these occasions. The following was delivered to at least half of the members in one day last session:

" ———— BILL.

" SIR,
" The opponents of this measure, in defiance of their solemn undertaking, are determined to divide the House on the above bill to-morrow, on the ——— reading; so that one of the most beneficial measures ever brought before the consideration of the legislature will be unjustly defeated, if the members of the House fail to attend at 4 o'clock, when the Speaker takes the chair.

"Your obedient humble servant,

"Agent.

"To ———, Esq., M.P."

To this epistle was appended a postscript in the following terms:

"P. S. I have taken the liberty to make this intimation at the suggestion of Mr. ———."

Mr. ———, who made this kind suggestion, was a member holding shares!

There were various other shareholding members who canvassed in the same ingenious way for the support of their colleagues on the same reading of the bill!

Should the bill escape the perilous ordeal of the two first readings, it is referred to a select committee, to hear what may be urged for or against it by the different parties, and to report thereon to the House. As this tribunal is private, and its doors closed against the public and the press, it may be easily understood that it is the arena for the grand conflict. The member who has hitherto managed the measure, selects the members for the place or county connected locally with the bill, some members from the adjoining counties, and any other members whom he likes, and whom, it may be supposed, he takes care to select from among those interested in the bill, or who have private reasons to favour it. Such a committee will not suit the interests of the adversaries: in order, therefore, to bring their phalanx into action, they either move to add their names to the committee, or to allow all the members of the House to vote. The latter motion is generally resorted to in the first instance, as it is sure to be made ultimately by the party who find the scale turning against them. As the peculiar advantages of the project are set out in the preamble or introduction to the bill, the first step, on the part of its promoters, is to prove them; which they do by hiring one, two, or more barristers to make addresses to the committee, and examine witnesses. If the opponents of the bill have not strength enough to strike a decisive blow in the beginning of the proceedings, they prolong them by speeches of counsel, by endless examinations and cross-examinations of the witnesses for the bill; and if this will not answer their turn, they bring forward witnesses on their own side, whom they submit to the same process. In the committee of last year upon the bill for lighting London with Oil Gas, the bill was opposed by three established coal gas companies, and the array of counsel on all sides amounted to thirteen; — ten of whom were opposed to the bill! Let our readers figure to themselves, if they can, what the ingenuity of ten lawyers, confined by no rules of examination, and controlled by no power or dignity in their tribunal, could do in the way of vexatious delay. The unpleasantness of the proceedings, as may be imagined, generally keeps the committee-room empty; so that the only members who sit to keep up appearances, are those who are interested in the project: they rarely consist of more than half a dozen, and frequently of only two; one to sit in the chair, and preside over the other. In the committee upon the London Oil Gas bill, we generally saw the chairman and about four or five members; once, we recollect to have seen the chairman alone.

If the opponents of the bill fail in delaying the measure, their next step is to get the committee to adjourn sine die, or to so distant a day as to prevent the bill from passing into a law. For this purpose, the members of the House are all re-canvassed, and every artifice used to procure a majority. As the promoters of the bill are never safe against surprise in this way, they have to renew their canvass nearly every day, at an enormous expense, and with the greatest hazard of alienating their friends, by bringing them down when not wanted. In a petition from the projectors of the London Oil Gas Company, who had been defeated by the committee's adjourning sine die, it was stated, that the committee, after spending a month in hearing their evidence, suddenly adjourned sine die, upon hearing the case of only one of the three opposing companies, and that the committee almost entirely consisted of members holding shares in the opposing companies, one member being one of their chairmen. This statement has never been denied.

As the promoters of the bill have, however, the power of turning the tables upon their opponents, by closing the proceedings, a compromise is sometimes entered into, by which the parties engage not to agitate the question of adjournment without due notice. In bargains of this kind, we have heard members take a part, on their respective sides, with as little disguise as the parties themselves or their attorneys.

Should the question of adjournment be disposed of, the first point for the decision of the committee is the proof of the preamble. Our readers would be under a great mistake if they supposed that no member would venture to give a vote at this stage who had not heard the witnesses. The only ears that hear the witnesses and the lawyers are those of the half dozen members who have particular reasons for their attendance. But, as soon as the first division is expected to take place, the canvassing and intriguing for reinforcements from the body of the House are resumed, so that it sometimes occurs that sixty or eighty members are assembled to vote, not more than a tenth of whom have listened to a single word of the proceedings. The committee-room presents the most lively scene for a few minutes before the division. Members, managers, and attorneys may be seen, some marshalling their parties, others scouring the passages of the House to catch a stray member, or ransacking the other committee-rooms; whilst others speed to the parliamentary clubs, and freight hackney-coaches to the House with the idlers. This process sometimes yields an ample harvest of recruits. In the case of the Highgate Chapel bill, the opponents of the measure, who consisted of sixteen out of twenty, were overwhelmed by a reinforcement of twenty fresh members suddenly enlisted from the other committee-rooms, not one of whom had ever heard one word of the proceedings.

If the preamble is decided to be proved, the next step is to examine and decide upon the different clauses of the bill, which gives ample scope to bring the existence of the project again into question, as will be seen by the following case which occurred last session. The proceedings on the Liverpool and Manchester Railway bill, after having occupied seven weeks in the examination of witnesses, the speeches of counsel, and the discussions, first of the committee of standing orders, and afterwards of the committee upon the bill, were brought to a close on the preamble, which was decided to have been proved by a majority of thirty-seven against thirty-six: this vote established the fact that the railway in question would be beneficial, and ought to be constructed. The committee then adjourned to the following day. The promoters of the bill, slumbering with unconscious security upon this decision, neglected to take vigorous measures to order down their cohorts the next day in force. Not so their adversaries, who sent down a compact body. The first clause called on, was, to enact that it should be lawful for the projected company to make the proposed railway. The opponents, seeing their superior force, came to an early division, and rejected it by a majority of nineteen against thirteen. The next clause, authorizing the purchase of certain lands through which the road must pass, or be given up, was then called on, and rejected by a similar majority. So that the decision which established that a railway, in the direction of the lands proposed to be purchased, ought to be made, was entirely annihilated by the majority of a committee which did not count so many members on both sides as the simple majority of the day before.

Should the committee at length agree, the bill is referred to the House, where it is again read, the members again undergoing a canvass.

After the bill has passed the House of Commons, it is carried up to the House of Lords, where it is read twice, and referred to a private committee. This committee, though less obnoxious to the imputation of unfairness than that of the other House, is equally open to objection on another score; for it consists, for the day, of any peers, amounting to nine or upwards, who may take it into their heads to walk down to Westminster. Hence, should the proceedings last more than one day, it necessarily happens that one part of them is heard by one set of judges, and another part by a second set. This anomaly, is, in practice, got rid of; for my Lord Shaftesbury, who is the chairman, salaried by the House to preside on all committees, is the real judge in every case; the committee rarely venturing to decide against the better opinion of their chairman. This is so well known to the agents and managers of private bills, that they always take care to have a private meeting with the chairman or his clerk before the bill is brought before the committee, in order to settle the disputable points beforehand with greater convenience. Should my Lord Shaftesbury pronounce in favour of the bill, it is read a third time, and becomes a law, on receiving the royal assent.

The system in the Lower House met with very severe reprobation at several periods during the last session. One member went so far as to state, that it was a "shame and reproach to the honour and character of parliament *;" and another declared, that "nothing could be more scandalous than the conduct of private committees, and, until the system was altered, he would never sit on another†." Such declarations—and we might quote many such,—render it unnecessary for us to add any thing in the way of condemnation.

Some partial remedies were suggested. In one of them it was proposed to exclude all members interested either for or against a bill, from voting. The only objection of any weight urged against this proposition was, that it would be evaded by members buying shares in the names of other parties‡; which is certainly a decisive objection against the House's legislating at all on such matters, so long as the public are kept in the dark as to the merits of the question by its being decided in secret by a private committee. Another improvement suggested, was, to select the committee by ballot, with power to strike out a certain number of names at the instance of the parties to the measure, for the purpose of excluding interested members; but the advanced age of some members, and the official duties, business, and professions of others, are insurmountable objections to this plan. A third plan suggested by a select committee, delegated during the last session to inquire into the subject, was to abolish the practice of opening the committee to all the members of the House, and to commit the bill to the member who manages it,—the members serving for the place connected with the project,—to sixty members taken equally from adjoining counties, and sixty more taken indiscriminately from Great Britain and Ireland,—with power for the parties to strike out thirty names, in order to exclude interested members. It was believed that a quorum of such members might be prevailed on to investigate private bills fairly. Assuming that it is proper to have the attendance of the members for places locally connected with the project, this plan is still very defective; for it provides no remedy for cases in which the projects have no local connexion, such as foreign mining or trading speculations, projects connected with the colonies, or projects affecting the kingdom at large, like the Equitable Loan or Alliance Insurance Companies. But we object to the principle of confiding private bills, involving local interests, to the members representing the places interested; for those members invariably treat such measures in connection with electioneering intrigues; as was shewn in more instances than one during the last session.—The Hull Dock bill, for example, which sought to make all vessels trading to that port, pay new rates, and therefore could not exempt vessels from any particular port without manifest injustice, was brought in by the corporation, and supported by the members of Hull: the members for Beverley, who on the principle of choosing members locally connected, sat upon the committee, were instructed by their constituents to oppose the bill, unless the vessels trading from their borough were exempted; and the supporters of the bill, finding such an opposition inconvenient, yielded the exemption: Hedon, Grimsby, and Gainsborough, boroughs in the neighbourhood of Hull, together with the members for Lincolnshire, all threatened opposition, and yielded only upon terms: while the members of all these places were obliged to vote in obedience to their constituents, under pain of losing their seats at the next election.—Besides, what is to prevent the admission of indirectly interested members, among the list of the sixty indiscriminate votes, unless they be chosen by lot, the inconvenience of which we have already adverted to?

It appears to us impossible to frame any plan for private committees, which is not either unfair to the public, or to the members of the House. There is a general objection which the committee appointed to investigate the subject did not think proper to make, viz. the want of publicity in the proceedings. The importance of the press as a check upon the conduct of committees is so manifest, that we need not remark upon it. Its importance as a check upon the House itself we think equally certain: and should the public be put in possession of the merits of a private bill by the publication of the proceedings before the committee, they would have a considerable check against unfairness in the House itself, as they would then be in a position to judge of the integrity of the votes. The objection to publishing these proceedings on the score of breach of privilege, is a mere objection of form; and if applicable at all, would apply with equal force against publishing the proceedings of the courts of justice. However, the number of committees sitting at the same time, and the confusion and delay of their proceedings, from their want of means to control the litigant parties, would prevent any beneficial exercise of the press, as those committees are constituted at present.

The radical fault lies in the construction of the committee; and as its defects, according to every view we can take of the subject, appear incurable, we conclude that recourse must be had to some other tribunal in its place. For this purpose, we see no objection to appointing a set of salaried commissioners, each to sit in an open court, to decide upon the merits of a proposed bill, and to make his report to the House, accompanied by the evidence. As they should be prohibited from holding any interest in the projects, a fair decision would, so far, be secured. Their habits of business, and the powers that might be lodged in their hands to control the proceedings, would abridge the scandalous delays which have been denounced by the committee of the House of Commons as "injurious to the ends of justice, and the character of parliament;" and their sitting in open court, and exposure to the press, would be at once a check upon themselves and the House. The practicability of this plan is obvious, as all such business in the House of Lords is in effect done by one peer, whose integrity and diligence have never been questioned. As such a commission must be made by an act of the whole legislature, it might serve for both Houses, and thus rid the public at once of the defects peculiar to each of them in the present system.
